

No. 504

MAY 28th, 1915

5 Cents.

FAME ^{AND} FORTUNE WEEKLY.

STORIES OF BOYS THAT MAKE MONEY.

NEVER SAY DIE;

OR, THE YOUNG SURVEYOR OF HAPPY VALLEY.

By A SELF-MADE MAN

AND OTHER STORIES

The sun was just setting behind the distant hills when Fred and Bert came unexpectedly upon a startling sight. Two weather-bleached corpses, with their arms bound together, lay as they had fallen on either side of a tree.

2 (912)

WEEKLY

MONEY.

LINE

AIR.

MADE IN U.S.A.

1957 - 1958
RALPH P. SMITH
BOX 985
LAWRENCE, MASS.

Fame and Fortune Weekly

STORIES OF BOYS WHO MAKE MONEY

Issued Weekly—By Subscription $2.50 per year. Entered at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter, by Frank Tousey, Publisher, 168 West 23d Street, New York.

No. 507.

NEW YORK, JUNE 18, 1915.

Price 5 Cents.

Striving for Fortune

—OR—

FROM BELL-BOY TO MILLIONAIRE

By A SELF-MADE MAN

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCES THE HERO.

"There's a letter for me, isn't there?"

It was Miss Pillsberry, a spinster lady of uncertain age, who spoke, and the question was addressed to Fred Bowers, a bright-eyed, curly-headed, good-looking boy of fourteen, who was perched upon a worn and rickety stool behind the counter of the one general store and postoffice of the village at Alton, in the Catskills.

The store was owned by Nathan Gardner, a tall, thin, vinegary-looking man of forty, whose mean and grasping nature was in full accord with his personal appearance.

Mr. Gardner was a widower, and his sister, Miss Minerva Gardner, two years his junior, who in many respects was not unlike her brother, kept house for him.

He had one son, named Tom, a freckle-faced, sandy-haired and sallow-featured boy of fifteen, who was not a whit more popular among the boys of the village than his father, was with the grown-up folks.

The other member of the family was Fred Bowers.

He was considered a dependent, and came in for the short end of everything.

This kind of treatment might have soured the disposition of some boys, but it had no such effect upon Fred.

It was not because he was a meek or spiritless boy that Fred Bowers put up with the unfair conditions by which he was surrounded.

Not at all.

Fred was as spunky and independent as boys come, endowed with true courage, which lacked only the occasion to develop.

The fact was the boy was blessed with a sunny nature, and though he was often depressed for the moment, and on the edge of revolt, when particularly hard-pressed by either Nathan, Tom or Miss Minerva, or all three together, as often happened, his spirits instantly rebounded with the elasticity of a rubber ball, when the disagreeable conditions were removed.

Everybody in the village and for miles around knew how the Gardners treated Fred Bowers, and they sympathized with his position.

The boys wondered why he didn't run away, while the girls often held small indignation meetings on the subject, for Fred was the best-liked lad in Alton and vicinity.

For the greater part of the year the village led a sort of Rip Van Winkle existence, as if the spirit of that noted character brooded over the place.

But during the summer it woke up and was endowed with real life, for half of the people took in boarders, probably in more senses than one, and an influx of city folks made the quiet lanes and woods and by-ways hum after a fashion.

It was about the middle of May, and a very fine morning, that Miss Pillsberry came into the Gardner store to ask for a letter she had been impatiently expecting for two or three days.

She had called the day before in respect to it and had been disappointed.

Evidently, from the tone of her voice on this occasion, she seemed to entertain no doubt but that the letter was snugly sandwiched between others in the box, and only awaited the ready fingers of Fred Bowers to come forth.

"Good-morning, Miss Pillsberry," said Fred, pleasantly, jumping down from his stool to wait on her. "I will look and see."

Miss Pillsberry was not in the most cheerful of moods just then, but in spite of that fact she managed to bestow a smile upon the village favorite.

She looked a bit anxious, in spite of her apparent confidence that her letter was there as Fred took the bunch of envelopes from the box and began to sort them over.

At length he reached the last one.

There was no letter for Miss Pillsberry, and he told her so.

"Are you sure there isn't?" she persisted, almost sharply.

"I will go over them again, Miss Pillsberry," Fred said, good-naturedly, though he was certain there was no letter for her. "Are you expecting a particular letter?"

"Yes. I am going to visit my brother at Charlestown, and a week ago I received a letter from him in which he said he would send me fifty dollars by mail on the following Thursday to pay my expenses. I ought to have got that letter last night, or at the latest in this morning's mail. Are you sure it hasn't been put in one of your other boxes by mistake?"

"I don't think so. If there is money in it it will probably be registered. I don't see any registered letters on hand. However, I will look over the others."

"You are very obliging, Fred Bowers," replied Miss Pillsberry gratefully. "Tom Gardner waited on me last night, and he wasn't at all nice. He wouldn't go over the other letters even when I told him that the letter was very important to me because it had the fifty dollars in it I was looking for."

Fred carefully examined the superscription of every letter in the pigeon-hole case, but there was none addressed to the anxious maiden lady.

"I really don't know what I shall do if it doesn't come," she said, with a troubled look. "I will have to give up my trip. I do want to see my brother so much. I haven't seen him since he was married, six years ago."

Fred silently sympathized with her in her disappointment.

Probably it will come in this evening's mail. I will be on the lookout for it. If it comes, and Mr. Gardner does not object, I will bring it over to your house."

"Thank you. You are such a different boy from Tom Gardner. I often wonder why you stay here when you are so unkindly treated as I have heard. I think most boys would want to make a change."

"I think I shall soon, Miss Pillsberry," replied Fred quietly.

"Do you really mean that?" she said quickly.

"Yes, ma'am. I am only waiting to get money enough to pay my way to New York. I hope you won't mention it, Miss Pillsberry. Mr. Gardner wouldn't like to hear that I intend to leave him, and it would make trouble for me."

"Oh, I won't say a word about it, you may depend."

"Thank you, Miss Pillsberry."

"What a nice, polite boy he is," thought the spinster as she left the store.

As Fred was mounting his stool again a very pretty red-cheeked girl came into the place.

Her name was Kittie Redwood, and her father owned a small farm near Alton.

The Redwoods took summer boarders to help out their scanty income, and consequently Miss Kittie was kept pretty busy helping her mother to wait upon them during the season.

She was about thirteen years old, as bright as a new penny and as lively as a young colt.

She and Fred were the very best of friends, and they were always glad to see each other.

"Hello, Kittie!" exclaimed Fred, delightedly. "What brings you to the village?"

"Why, pa's light wagon brought me," she giggled.

"Oh, say, Kittie, you're too smart this morning. Did you come in here to see me or to buy something?"

"Both."

"Well, I'm glad to see you, all right. What can I do for you?"

"Here's a list of the things we want. Mother wrote it out. You want to have the bundle ready when pa calls around with the wagon."

"I'll see that it's ready, Kittie."

"Are you all alone this morning?"

"Looks as if I was, doesn't it?"

"Yet. Where is Tom Gardner?"

"Gone fishing."

"Do you ever go fishing?"

"Not if Mr. Gardner has anything to say about it, and he generally does."

"I think it's a shame that you don't get more recreation."

"What's the use of kicking against a stone wall?"

"I shouldn't put up with it if I were you," replied Kittie spiritedly.

"I don't mean to long."

"What are you going to do?" she asked curiously.

"I'm going to dig out for New York."

"Do you mean that?" she asked, with a grave face.

"I certainly do. I've tried hard to do the right thing by Mr. Gardner and the family, but they don't seem to appreciate my efforts."

"That's a bargain, now."

"So as soon as I get enough saved up to take me down the river and keep me a week or two in the city I'm going to make a start."

"I shall be sorry to have you go, Fred," said Kittie, swinging her sunbonnet to and fro. "Very, very sorry."

"Why, Kittie?"

"Oh, because——"

"Because what?"

"Because I like you, Fred. There now, I've said it," and she looked covertly at him from under her long lashes.

"And I like you, too, Kittie. I'll write to you when I get to the city and tell you how I get on."

"Will you?" she asked eagerly.

"Sure I will. Will you write to me, too?"

"Yes, if you want me to."

"That's a bargain now."

Fred had been taking down from the shelves the various articles enumerated on the list, and after he had checked them off he began to make a bundle of them.

"I suppose you're going to take boarders this summer, as usual, aren't you?" asked the boy.

"Oh, yes. Pa has built an addition to the house, so that we'll be able to accommodate four or five more."

"It makes a good deal of work for you and your mother, I should think."

"It does that; but we need the money."

"That's what they all say," laughed Fred. "The Chilton Farm is beginning early. They've got one boarder there already."

"So I've heard. We'll have two a week from now and six by the first of June."

"Those are the early birds."

"They're going to stay all summer. By the way, didn't I see Miss Pillsberry leaving the store just before I came?"

"Yes. She was after a letter which she said contained fifty dollars from her brother. It hasn't got here yet, and she was disappointed. She told me that she was going to visit her brother at Chestertown. The money she expects is to pay her traveling expenses."

"It will be a new thing for her to go traveling. She hasn't been away from the village as long as I can remember."

"That's right. She hasn't been out of Alton in fifteen years at least."

At this juncture Mr. Redwood entered the store.

"The bundle is all ready, pa," said Kittie, pointing to it.

The farmer nodded pleasantly to Fred.

"I suppose Kittie has been talking you deaf, dumb and blind," he grinned.

"Why, pa, the idea!"

"Not at all, Mr. Redwood. I was very glad to see Kitty. I like to talk to her."

"Oh, you do, eh? We find her a great chatterbox at home," laughed the farmer.

"Aren't you just horrid, pa!"

"I'll trouble you for a package of smoking tobacco, Fred," said Mr. Redwood, hauling out a long buckskin purse.

The boy got the tobacco.

"What's the damage?" asked the farmer, putting the package in his pocket.

"Altogether you owe us $2.35," replied Fred, handing him back the slip Kittie had brought, with the cost of each item marked against it.

"I guess I have the exact change," said Mr. Redwood, after dumping the contents of the purse on the counter, and separating two one-dollar bills and thirty-five cents, which he pushed over to the boy.

"That's correct, Mr. Redwood," said Fred, putting the money in the till.

"Come along, Kittie," said her father. "Your mother said I should hurry back."

"Good-by, Fred. Remember you mustn't leave Alton without seeing me."

"I won't, Kittie. I couldn't think of doing that. Good-by."

The boy mounted the stool once more and took up the old copy of a New York paper he had been reading when Miss Pillsberry entered the store.

CHAPTER II.

THE MEETING IN THE GORGE.

Mr. Gardner returned from a neighboring village about half-past eleven, and soon after his sister thrust her head in at the rear door and called out:

"Fred Bowers, come out in the kitchen and fetch me a pail of water."

The boy obeyed with his customary promptness, but in Miss Minerva's eyes he had lead on his feet.

"It's a wonder you wouldn't move around more lively," she said sharply, as he placed the pail on the floor near the sink.

Fred made no reply.

He was quite used to Miss Gardner's way, and had learned from experience that it was better to say nothing when the spinster wagged her tongue.

"Come now, don't stand there gawking at me. Take that pan of potatoes and peel 'em. See that you don't take all day about it, either," she snapped.

Fred got a knife and started in.

"I hain't seen Tom since breakfast," she remarked after a while. "Do you know where he is?"

"Gone fishing, I believe."

"Who was that gal talkin' with you in the store a while ago?" asked Miss Gardner. "Seems to me you might better be 'tendin' to business than wastin' your time gallivantin'."

"That was Kittie Redwood," replied Fred.

"Huh!" sniffed the lady. "What did she have to say?"

"She was talking about the boarders they're going to have this summer, for one thing."

"Some people will do most anythin' for a dollar," snorted Miss Gardner.

Just then Tom Gardner appeared at the door with half a dozen very small fish strung on a string.

"I want them for dinner," he said, dropping the fish on the table.

"I don't see how I kin cook 'em, Thomas," replied his aunt.

"Well, you want to find a way," he said in a surly tone.

"That ain't no way to speak to me, Thomas," she replied, sharply.

Tom took no notice, but walked on through into the store.

Fred was kept busy at one thing or another until dinner was ready, when he was sent into the store to call Mr. Gardner and his precious son to the meal.

As for himself, he never had the honor of eating with the family except on Sunday.

He was expected to remain in the store until the others had finished, and then he was called to the table himself.

What was left was considered good enough for him.

Sometimes there wasn't enough of that to more than half satisfy his healthy appetite, and as a consequence he went hungry.

Tom got his fish that day, as he knew he would, though his aunt cooked them much against her will.

For that reason when Fred came to the table he found a tolerable amount of food awaiting him, for which unexpected blessing he was truly thankful.

After supper Fred was sent as usual in the wagon to the railroad station, six miles away, for the mail, and of course if he found any express packages there intended for Alton, or any supplies ordered by Mr. Gardner, he brought them back with him.

The road to the station was a wild and romantic one through the mountains, which Fred found particularly dreary in winter and early spring.

It was dark when the boy reached Undercliff Station.

The train had arrived and passed on half an hour before, and he found the mail bag waiting for him.

He left the bag that was to go down to Kingston by the morning train, and after a few minutes' conversation with the station agent, who was on very friendly terms with him, he started to return to town.

Half way back along the road he entered a gloomy gorge, where the hills towered all about him.

It broadened out in one spot into a wide plateau, and summer visitors were often told that this was the spot where Rip Van Winkle had played the famous game of ten-pins with the mountain dwarfs.

A ghostly-looking tree was also pointed out as the identical place where Rip had passed his twenty years of repose among its roots.

None of the people who lived in the neighborhood believed the story, of course, but nevertheless many of them had a sneaking idea that the gorge was haunted.

Fortunately Fred was not troubled with any nervous fancies of this kind, for he had to traverse the gorge twice a day for four months, whether he liked to or not.

He rarely met a vehicle, and still more rarely a pedestrian at night in the gorge, so that he never looked for any.

On this occasion, however, he was a bit startled to see a solitary figure sitting on a decaying tree trunk in the middle of the plateau.

At the moment the moon was just peeping above one of the distant peaks, and its rays falling upon the motionless figure threw his shadow half way across the road.

"Who the dickens can that be?" Fred asked himself, as he looked at the strange apparition.

The sound of the horse's feet and the ring of the wagon wheels aroused the man, whoever he was.

He stared across at Fred and his rig for a moment, then got up and staggered in a kind of uncertain, tipsy way toward the road.

Fred reined in and waited for him to come up.

"Shay, boy," he said in an inebriated manner, putting his hands on the shaft to steady himself; "going to (hic) Alton, aren't you?"

"I am," replied Fred, looking closely at the man, who was well dressed and of rather fine appearance. "Are you stopping in the neighborhood of the village?" he added, wondering if this was the early boarder at Chilton Farm, about whom he had heard. "If you are, I'll be glad to give you a lift to your boarding place."

"Just what I was 'bout to ask you to do, young man. Been out walking for my health. Got lost somehow, and want to (hic) get back. Live at Chilton Farm, but don't want to go back there at this hour looking like this—you understand, young man. I'm couple sheets in the wind. Took a drop of something strong to keep the cold off. But people don't understand that. Sure to say I'm 'toxicated. Give me hard name.

Hurt my reputation. Understand? Won't do 'tall. People see me this way, sure to talk. Then news get into papers. Senator Smith drunk. Bad sign. Won't do. Now do me the favor to take me to inn at Alton. Proprietor friend of mine. Won't talk. Everything all right—see?"

Fred saw what the gentleman was getting at, and of course was perfectly willing to help him out of his dilemma.

He got down and with considerable difficulty assisted the man to get up on the seat.

The senator had so little control over his limbs that he would have got a nasty tumble only that the boy's strong arms upheld him.

At last he got his passenger seated and drove on at a slow trot.

"Shay, boy, what name?"

"You want to know my name, sir?"

"Zat's right."

"My name is Fred Bowers."

"Bowers! Knew a man named Bowers once. Shaved him from long term in State prison. Fine man, but he had close call. You look like fine boy. How old?"

"Fourteen."

"Don't shay! Big for (hic) age. Old 'nough to keep secret, ain't you?"

The senator looked anxiously at Fred.

"What kind of secret?"

"What kind of secret? Why, finding me two or three sheets in wind down in gorge. Understand?"

"Yes, sir. You don't want the fact known?"

"Zat's right. Smart boy. Remember what I said a while back. Won't do to have name in papers with disagreeable facts. Understand?"

"I understand, sir."

"Bright boy! Like to reward sensible boy. Here, take this," and he offered Fred a small roll of bills.

"No, sir. I don't want to pay for doing you a favor."

"Nonsense! Put it in your pocket. Plenty more where zat came from."

"I'd rather not take it," protested Fred.

"Why not?"

"I don't want to be paid for helping you out of your trouble. I am quite willing to do that for nothing."

Senator Smith scratched his head and looked hard at the young driver.

Apparently it was a new sensation for him to find any one who was satisfied to do something for nothing.

He was afraid Fred's words covered some other motive, and the very idea made him uneasy.

Maybe the boy intended to make something by sending the news of his condition to the newspapers.

While he was considering the matter Fred drove up to the door of the Stag Inn at Alton.

"Here we are, sir, at the Stag Inn. That's where you wanted to go, isn't it? I'll call Mr. Drew, the landlord."

"Wait a moment. Promise me you'll keep secret, young man."

"I promise you on my word of honor," replied Fred.

"Good boy! Call landlord."

As Fred started to alight the senator dropped the wad of money into his pocket.

"Got him (hic) zat time," chuckled Senator Smith, as Fred entered the small hotel. "Can't shay now I didn't reward him in suitable (hic) manner."

Landlord Drew came outside and sized up the situation in a moment.

With Fred's assistance he guided the senator upstairs to a room and helped him into bed, while the boy drove on down the street to Mr. Gardner's store.

CHAPTER III.

FRED HAS A RUN-IN WITH TOM GARDNER.

When Fred drove up to the store with the wagon Mr. Gardner was standing in front of the door looking as dark as a thundergust.

"What kept you so long away?" demanded the storekeeper, wrathfully.

The boy was about to explain about his meeting with Senator Smith and how he had brought him to the village and helped get him up to a room in the Stag Inn when it occurred to him that he had promised to say nothing about the matter, so he remained silent.

"I asked you what kept you so long away. Haven't you got a tongue in your head?" roared Mr. Gardner, grabbing Fred by the arm and shaking him in a savage way.

"I don't think I've been any longer than usual," replied Fred, doggedly.

"You don't think!" howled the storekeeper. "How dare you say that, you young jackanapes! You've been half an hour longer than usual. People have been here lookin' for their mail, and have gone away. First thing I know there'll be complaints agin me. I've a good mind to give you the blamest lickin' you ever had in your life. I s'pose you stood around chinnin' to the station agent, you lazy young villain!" To this Fred made no reply.

"Why don't you answer me?" cried the exasperated postmaster.

"What's the use? You won't believe me," replied Fred.

Mr. Gardner glared at his boy viciously.

Then he picked the mail bag out of the wagon and gave Fred a rude push.

"Take the rig and put it up. If you're over five minutes doin' it I'll skin you alive."

Fred led the horse and wagon around into the yard, and unharnessing the animal, put him into his stall.

Then he reappeared before the store and began to take the boxes and other articles exposed outside into the place.

Mr. Gardner was behind the counter sorting the mail into the pigeon-holes.

Tom was seated on a soap box smoking a cigarette.

He did not offer to help Fred move a single article.

In fact, it gave him great satisfaction to see the drudge of the family work.

The more work Fred had to do the better it pleased him.

Finally, when Fred had about finished, Tom slyly kicked over a small box filled with new potatoes.

"What did you do that for?" demanded Fred, who had seen the mean act.

"What are you talkin' about?" grinned Tom, insolently.

"You kicked that box of potatoes over."

"Kicked nothin' over. It fell over itself. You can pick 'em up now and put 'em back."

"Pick them up yourself."

"If you don't pick 'em up I'll tell dad."

"Tell him if you wish to. I'll tell him I saw you knock it over."

"He won't believe you," snickered Tom.

"I won't pick them up, if he kills me, and, further," walking up to Tom with a resolute air, "if you don't pick those potatoes up right away I'll knock the head off of you right here in the store."

Tom shrank away from him in alarm.

He was a big coward, and, although Fred had never struck him in his life, he was afraid of the stout boy, and not without reason, for Fred could have handled him with one hand.

Tom was thoroughly startled by the look on the other's face, which showed that he meant business, so he jumped up and fled behind the counter for safety.

Fred, however, was after him in an instant, undeterred by the presence of Mr. Gardner or the half a dozen villagers present.

Tom set up a roar when Fred grasped him by the collar.

"Let me alone, will you?" he cried, kicking out at the determined boy.

But Fred's blood was up.

He had already been angered by the reception he had received from Mr. Gardner, and he was ripe for rebellion.

Utterly regardless of the consequences, he dragged the struggling and howling son of the storekeeper from his place of refuge over to the pile of scattered potatoes, and, pushing him down on his knees, said:

"Pick them up, or I'll make you dance for it!"

The uproar, of course, had attracted general notice.

Mr. Gardner came from behind the counter, and as soon as he realized that Tom was in Fred's clutches he attacked the boy savagely.

"How dare you lay your hands on my son, you reptile!" he roared, belaboring Fred over the head with his fist.

One of the villagers interfered and dragged him away.

"Do you want to kill the boy?" he said, keeping between them.

Fred, nothing daunted, maintained his hold on Tom.

"Pick up those potatoes, do you hear me?" he demanded with flushed face.

"Help, dad, help!" howled Tom.

"Let me at him!" cried Mr. Gardner, angrily. "Why do you interfere?"

"Let the boys fight the matter out between themselves," said the villager. "I saw the whole thing. Your son is in the wrong. He kicked over that box of potatoes on purpose to make Fred pick them up."

"I don't believe it," snarled the storekeeper.

"I saw him do it," replied the villager, coolly.

The people in the store were now gathered about the scene of the trouble.

"Did you upset that box of potatoes, Tom?" asked his father.

"Didn't do no such thing. It fell over accidentally."

"There," cried Mr. Gardner, triumphantly. "I knew he didn't do it."

"He did do it," now asserted Fred. "He did it on purpose to give me the work of picking them up, just as if I didn't have enough to do without that," cried the boy indignantly.

"You're a little liar!" snarled the storekeeper. "Leave Tom alone and pick them potatoes up or I'll skin you alive."

"I won't pick one of them up," replied Fred, defiantly; "not if I was to be killed for it."

"What!" roared Mr. Gardner, aghast at this evidence of rebellion on the part of this drudge.

"Tom upset them. Make him pick them up."

The storekeeper tried to get at Fred again, but the villager prevented him.

The boy then dropped Tom and walked away from the crowd, seating himself on a sugar barrel at the end of the store.

Tom got up, gave the pile of potatoes a vicious kick, scattering them about and ran out of the store.

Mr. Gardner shook his fist at Fred, and, with a muttered threat of what he would do to him later on, returned behind the counter.

People came and went for the next hour, some of them after mail and some after tobacco and sundry articles.

Fred sat on the barrel and nursed his indignation for half an hour, after which he deliberately walked up to his room, leaving Mr. Gardner to close the store himself.

The boy had reached the last straw of his patience, and was determined to leave the Gardners for good that night.

He packed up his few articles of personal property in an old grip he had acquired, and taking the five odd dollars he had saved almost penny by penny in the last two years from under the corner of the old rag carpet where he had kept it concealed, put it into his pocket.

Then he sat down by the window to wait until the house was quiet.

After Mr. Gardner had closed the store he hunted up a stout rawhide and, burning with resentment against the boy, softly mounted the stairs to his room with the intention of satisfying his feelings.

Fred had anticipated some such move on the storekeeper's part, and had not only locked his door, but barricaded it with a heavy dresser that formed part of the furniture of the little shabby room.

Mr. Gardner swore when he found that he was balked in his amiable intentions.

He had some idea of breaking the door down, but he was afraid that while he was engaged in doing it the boy would escape by the window, which overlooked the roof of the kitchen addition, so he refrained from carrying the idea out.

Then he thought of getting a ladder and climbing upon the kitchen roof and entering the room by the window, but finally concluded to wait until morning, and then give Fred a double dose of the rawhide.

So with pleasant anticipations of what he would do to the boy in the morning, he retired to his own room and went to bed.

CHAPTER IV.

THE ROBBERY OF THE MAIL.

Fred heard Mr. Gardner come upstairs and try his door, and he guessed what the storekeeper's object was.

He listened until he was satisfied that the head of the Gardner household had gone to his room, then he removed the barricade from the door and sat down to wait for another hour to pass.

When he heard the clock in the room underneath strike eleven he decided that it was safe to make a move, so he unlocked his door, thrust his head out and listened intently.

The house seemed to be wrapped in silence and gloom.

Removing his shoes and taking them in one hand and his grip in the other, he cautiously made his way along the cor-

"Don't say nothin' about it, and I'll put the money back."

"Back where?"

"Into the envelope, and I'll put the envelope back in the pigeon-hole."

Tom looked hastily around for the envelope, but couldn't see it.

Then he looked on the floor behind the counter, and on the other side of the counter, but could not see a sign of it.

"Where is it? I didn't burn it. Only started to do so."

"I've got it in my pocket," replied Fred, who had been watching the scared boy with a curious grin.

"Give it to me, then," cried Tom, holding out his hand for it.

"It wouldn't do you any good, for it was partly burned anyway."

"I don't believe it."

"Then I'll show you," said Fred, putting his hand in his pocket and pulling it out to show the boy.

Something else came out with it and dropped on the counter.

That something else was the roll of bills Senator Smith had dropped into his pocket outside of the inn that evening unknown to him.

Tom Gardner's sharp eyes lit upon the bills at once, and he uttered an exclamation of surprise.

Then a crafty expression came into his shifty eyes.

"I guess if it comes to that I ain't the only thief, after all. Where did you get all that money, Fred Bowers?"

CHAPTER V.

THE SPRINGING OF THE TRAP.

Fred was never so surprised in his life at the unexpected appearance of that roll of bills from his pocket.

He stared at the wad as if it had been a snake or something of that nature.

If he heard Tom's insulting words they made no impression on his senses at the moment.

Tom, however, with a covetous chuckle, grabbed up the roll and counted it in a twinkling.

"Fifty dollars," he grinned. "Just the same I got out of the letter," and he tossed it back, picking up the roll he had pilfered and holding it tight. "I guess you don't want none of mine. Anyway, you won't get none. If you tell on me I'll tell on you, see?" and he chuckled with satisfaction, as he felt he had settled the difficult problem with which he had been confronted a moment before.

Fred couldn't help seeing that things had taken an unpleasant turn.

How had that money got into his pocket?

And such a big sum, too, for he had mechanically watched Tom count it over, and when his young enemy announced the amount he could hardly believe the evidence of his eyes and ears.

All at once he remembered the roll which Senator Smith had tried to press upon him as a bribe for his silence as to the politician's condition.

"It must be the same," he thought. "The senator managed in some way to drop it into my pocket."

Certainly that must be the truth, for in no other way could he account for the possession of so much money.

But Tom's self-satisfied grin and half-sneering expression made him exceedingly angry.

He easily saw that the storekeeper's son believed he had obtained that money in some underhand way.

"It's a bargain, isn't it?" said Tom, with a malicious chuckle.

"No, it isn't a bargain," cried Fred indignantly. "Do you think I stole that money?"

"Where would you get fifty dollars all in a lump if you didn't steal it? You've been robbing dad's till, I'll bet."

"What!" gasped Fred, startled at such a suggestion.

"You needn't pretend you haven't. But I don't care whether you have or not. He can stand it. It'll be a good joke on him, for he's closer than a clamshell, and it'll do me good to see the fuss he'll make when he finds out the money is gone. He'll be sure to say you took it, so if I was you I'd dust out at once before he finds out he has been robbed."

Clearly Tom Gardner was a model son.

He had as much feeling and respect for his father as a stone. Fred found himself in an embarrassing situation.

He couldn't make an explanation to Tom, and even if he had felt free to do so he knew the storekeeper's son wouldn't believe him.

He picked up the fifty-dollar wad and put it in his pocket, fully determined to return it to Senator Smith as soon as he could, though when that opportunity would occur he couldn't say unless he gave up his project of leaving the village that night.

"Are you going to return that money to Miss Pillsberry?" he asked Tom.

"Sure thing," grinned the boy. "Just watch me do it."

He picked up the envelope, put the fifty dollars into it and stowed it away in his pocket.

"I'll carry it over to her in the morning," he added.

"But you'll have to explain how the letter and the end of the envelope came to be burned. How are you going to do that?"

"Don't you worry about that," chuckled Tom. "She'll be glad to get the money without waitin' to know too much about what happened to the rest of it."

"All right. Fix the matter up any way you think will let you out of the scrape and I'll be satisfied."

Tom grinned broadly.

He felt that the fifty dollars was as good as his own now.

"Fred is only putting up a bluff," he said to himself. "He wants to hold onto that money he's stolen from dad. I thought he was a chump, but I guess he's pretty slick, after all. Gee! Won't dad be wild when he finds himself fifty dollars out?"

That reflection evidently tickled him greatly, for he snickered loudly.

"I guess I'll go to bed," he said. "Say, how is it you ain't been in bed at all yourself?"

The suspicion had just struck him that Fred had come into the store to look at the till and see if his father had left any money in it overnight.

The fact that his father was uncommonly careful with his money, and never left any around loose, did not appear to strike him.

"That's my business," replied Fred, in answer to his question.

Tom chuckled as he moved around the end of the counter.

Fred picked up the candle and followed him.

When he reached the entry door he blew it out.

At that moment Tom stumbled over an obstacle in his path and went down on his hands and knees.

He put out his hand and felt of the obstruction.

"It's a valise," he said to himself. "Fred's valise, too. I knew it by the broken handle. So he's goin' to light out to-night. That's why he hasn't been in bed. I'm glad of it. I hate him worse'n p'sen. I hope I'll never see him again."

Tom decided not to let on that he suspected Fred's intentions.

He was afraid the boy might change his mind and postpone his project.

So he got up and began to tiptoe upstairs.

He resolved to watch, however, to see if Fred really took his departure.

As for Fred, he did not dare remain downstairs under present circumstances.

That would be altogether too suspicious.

Therefore he followed Tom up to the passage above, leaving his shoes and valise near the entry door, and went to his room once more, where he expected to pass another hour until he was satisfied Tom had fallen asleep and the coast was clear.

Hardly had the two boys closed their room doors behind them than Mr. Gardner came out into the passage in his stocking feet and, leaning over the railing, listened intently.

He had been aroused by the noise made by Tom sprawling over Fred's valise.

Sitting up in bed, he listened, not quite sure as to what it was that had awakened him.

Then he fancied he heard the stairs creak, whereupon he jumped out of bed and opened his room door just a moment too late to catch the two boys on the way to their rooms.

"I wonder if anybody has broken into the store?" he asked himself, after listening for a full minute and hearing nothing.

He determined to go down and see.

Taking care to make as little noise as possible, he descended the staircase.

Pausing at the foot, he listened again.

Not a suspicious sound reached his ears.

Then he moved forward to the entry door leading into the store.

He looked into the place, but it was as dark and silent as the grave.

"Guess I must have been mistaken," he thought. "There hain't no one here."

He started to go back and he also tripped over Fred's valise.

"What's that?"

He investigated the object and found that it was a grip.

His roving fingers also discovered Fred's shoes.

"Oh, ho! I begin to smell a mouse. That young rascal Fred Bowers is intending to give me the slip to-night. The villain! After all I've done for him. Kept him in victuals and clothes since he was knee-high to a grasshopper. If that hain't gratitood may I be— Never mind! I'll just keep quiet 'round here and watch for him to come from his room. I'll give him the surprise of his life—the monkey! And to-morrow morning I'll lick him till he won't be able to sit down in a week."

So, with the grim determination of wreaking a terrible vengeance on the hapless boy, he hunted up a bit of candle and some matches and, taking his seat on an empty cracker box just inside the store door, he lay in wait for the appearance of his victim.

A full hour passed and the sitting-room clock struck one before anything happened.

Then a door above was softly opened and closed and the stairs began to creak under the stocking-feet of some one descending.

The storekeeper grinned savagely, and his fingers worked in anticipation of the moment when he would pounce upon the unsuspecting object of his wrath.

Whoever was coming down had now reached the foot of the staircase and had paused to listen.

Then the newcomer crept forward on his hands and knees as if searching for something.

As soon as his hands touched the valise he gave a grunt of satisfaction.

At that instant, like a bolt of lightning from a clear sky, Mr. Gardner sprang upon him.

As his talon-like fingers fastened on to the boy's jacket the youth uttered a cry of fright and commenced to struggle.

"Ho, ho, you young villain!" roared the storekeeper, with savage earnestness. "I've got you, have I? Goin' to sneak off in the dead of night, were you, thinkin' I wouldn't know nothin' about it. I'll fix you, you pestiferous little monkey! I'll warm your jacket nicely for you. When I've got through with you, you'll think you'd been drawn through a knot-hole, and a mighty small one at that."

He shook the boy as a cat might a mouse.

"Oh, oh, oh!" whimpered his victim. "You're hurtin' me. What's the matter with you? I ain't Fred Bowers; I'm Tom."

"Tom!" gasped the storekeeper, releasing his hold on the boy. "Is it really you, Tom?"

"Yes, it's me," replied his son, in a sulky tone. "You 'most shook the breath out of my body. What did you want to do? Kill me?"

Mr. Gardner struck a match to make sure that his ears had not deceived him.

Sure enough, there stood his son and heir, Tom Gardner, half dressed, the picture of a very rumpled boy.

CHAPTER VI.

FRED'S DEPARTURE FROM ALTON.

"What are you doin' down here at this hour of the night?" asked his father in no little surprise, as he lit the piece of candle.

"What are you doin' down here yourself?" replied his hopeful son, disrespectfully.

"I heard a noise somewhere in the house, and I thought some one had broken into the store, so I came down to look into it. I found them things yonder," pointing at Fred's shoes and valise. "They ain't got no business to be there, and they wasn't there when I went to bed. So I just thought I'd set a trap and see what I'd ketch."

"And you ketched me instead of the one you was watchin' for, didn't you?" grinned Tom, as he began to comprehend his parent's error.

"I did, unfortunately," admitted the postmaster, in a grump tone. "I thought I had hold of that pesky Fred Bowers. That's his grip and them are his shoes. Anybody with half an eye kin see that he's plann'd to run away to-night. He knowed I intended to give him a sound lickin' in the mornin', so he thought he'd play a march on me, the young rascal. Well, I've been waitin' nigh on to an hour for him to come down after his things, but he ain't showed up yet."

"Better put out the light, dad, if you're thinkin' of ketchin' him."

Mr. Gardner thought this advice good, and hastily blew out the candle.

"Now, Tom," said his father in a conciliatory tone, "you might tell me what woke you up and sent you down here. There hain't been no noise that I know of, for I kept as quiet as a mouse."

Tom tried to think of some excuse to account for his actions and remove any lingering suspicion in his father's mind.

He was not very successful, and was about to fall back on silence as his best defense, when suddenly a brilliant idea struck him.

Fred had $500 in his pocket, the exact amount that he (Tom) had abstracted from Miss Pillsberry's letter.

There was bound to be trouble about that letter in a day or two.

While he really believed that Fred had stolen that money, maybe by piecemeal from his father, it would be ever so much better if he could make it appear that he had stolen the spinster's letter, for that would relieve him of any suspicion in the matter.

He rather hoped Fred would get away, as that would simplify affairs, but still if he was caught with $50 in his possession, he would have a hard time trying to clear himself of the charge Tom intended should be brought against him.

"Well, dad," he said, slowly, "I had an idea that Fred was going to run away to-night."

"Eh? What made you think so?"

"He acted kind of suspicious like to me."

"If you thought so why didn't you tell me?"

"I wasn't sure about it, so I thought I'd watch and see if he really intended to do it."

"Well?" said his father, impatiently.

"When he went to his room I peeked through the key-hole, and what do you s'pose I saw?" went on Tom, making up his story as he went along.

"How should I know what you saw?" growled his father.

"I saw him countin' a roll of bills."

"A roll of what?" gasped the storekeeper.

"A roll of money."

"You must have been mistaken. Where would he get any money?"

"I wasn't mistaken, for I saw the money as plain as I ever seen anythin' in my life. It was a lot of money, too. He must have found it, or maybe he stole it. You ain't missed any money, have you, dad?"

"No; but if that little villain has any money in his possession he must have taken it from the till, a dollar at a time, when he got the chance. He could do that once and a while without me knowin' anythin' about it. The thievin' little monkey! Just wait till I lay my hands on him. I'll skin him alive."

"He put the money away in his pocket, and, while I was lookin' to see what he was goin' to do next, my foot slipped ag'in the door. He jumped up and I ran back to my room. Then you came up and went to bed."

"You ought to have come and told me what you'd seen."

"I wanted to ketch him myself. After a while I heard him go downstairs. I started to follow when he made a noise down here as if he'd fallen over somethin' and back he came again as fast as he could and ran into his room."

"That must have been the noise I heard."

"I waited for him to go down again, but I didn't hear him. Then I went to his door and looked through the keyhole once more. Everythin' was dark inside, and I didn't see nothin'. I waited a while longer, and then I came down here to see if he had sneaked without me hearin' him, when the first thing I knew you grabbed me."

"I reckon he hain't gone yet, for he wouldn't go without his valise and shoes," said Mr. Gardner. "He's waitin' up in his room till he feels sure that there isn't no danger of his being ketched. I think the best thing we kin do is to go up there softly and nab him where he is."

"All right, dad. You go and I'll follow."

The storekeeper started to lead the way, with his hopeful son at his heels.

Mr. Gardner chuckled to himself as he thought how surprised Fred Bowers would be when they marched in and pounced upon him.

Unfortunately for the success of this artful design, Fred was too bright a boy to be caught napping.

While the foregoing conversation was proceeding in the entry Fred, leaning over the railing of the passage above, was an interested listener to it.

And this was how he happened to get wise to the situation: He had actually opened his door for his final trip down-

"I thought so," with a grin. "Whereabouts in the country do you hail from?"

"Alton, in the Catskills."

"Up in the mountains, eh?"

"Yes."

"You've never worked in any kind of a hotel, have you?"

"No," replied Fred, cheerfully; "but I guess I can hold my end up."

"Where are you stopping?"

Fred mentioned the place on West street.

"All right. You'll live here with the rest of us. So go get your traps and report to me as soon as you come back. Understand?"

Fred said he did and started off for his grip, which held all of his worldly possessions.

When he returned to the hotel the boss of the bellboy contingent showed him where he would sleep and brought him a regulation uniform to try on.

It fitted him perfectly, much to the head bellboy's satisfaction.

"You'll wear that when you're on duty. Understand? I suppose you're ready to eat, aren't you?"

"Yes."

"Come along, then. It's our dinner hour."

He led him to the servant's hall, in the basement, near the big kitchen, and piloted him to a table where several other bellboys were getting outside of their mid-day meal.

"Sit down and pitch in," said his guide. "Help yourself to what you see, and don't be afraid to eat all you want. After dinner I'll instruct you in your duties, and give you a few pointers you will do well to follow."

One of the pointers Fred received was a significant mandate to divide all tips he received with his "boss."

Failure to do this right up to the handle would lead to unpleasant consequences, said the bellboy.

"That's my perquisite for putting you on to good things, see?" said his instructor, with a grin. "It's one of the rules of the house, and a boy who doesn't ante up gets it where the chicken got the axe. Some smart alecks, who thought they knew it all, tried to ring in their own bookkeeping on me. The chap whose place you are going to fill was one of them; but there's only one set of books kept in belldom, and I keep that, so don't waste your efforts trying to get more than is coming to you unless you get tired of the job. Don't get the idea in your head, either, that when I ain't around that I don't know all that's going on. Now that I've made you wise to a few things come upstairs and I'll show you where you sit. I'll let a little more light into your mansard roof another time. Do the right thing by me and it's dollars to doughnuts that you'll own a hotel like this some day yourself."

"Do you expect to own one?" asked Fred, innocently.

"Sure I do. Every head bellboy expects to be his own hotel manager before he begins to shed his second teeth."

It didn't take Fred long to get the hang of his duties and the run of a city hotel like the DeLux.

Some boys naturally come to the front at once, and Fred was one of these.

Before his first month was up he had become the most popular bellboy in the house, and his services were in constant demand by the guests of the house.

This of itself would ordinarily have given rise to a lot of jealousy among his associates, and got him into no end of private squabbles, but for two things.

One was that his genial ways and abundant good nature won him the friendship of his companions, while his strong physique and evident ability to take care of himself compelled their respect.

The other was his strict accounting of the many and frequently large tips he received from the guests to the head bellboy which made him a favorite with that personage, who in consequence became strongly biased in his favor, and helped him along in many ways that proved of great advantage to him in the long run.

Thus time sped away and Fred soon got accustomed to the ways of a big city, and he liked the life and noise of New York far better than the old humdrum existence he had formerly led in Alton.

After he had got well settled in his job at the Hotel DeLux he wrote a letter to Kittie Redwood, telling how he had come to leave the Catskills so suddenly, giving her the full particulars of the situation he had obtained; telling her how well he liked New York, and how some day he meant to own just such a hotel himself.

He asked her to write to him and let him have all the news from home.

This letter, for some unexplained reason, did not reach its destination, and Fred waited in vain for an answer.

He thought a great deal of Kittie, and her silence caused him to feel quite bad for a time.

"I guess she doesn't think enough of me, after all, to write," he said to himself some weeks afterward. "Well, I've done my part. I promised to write to her and I've done it. It's up to her now. If she doesn't care to send me any word, why, I can't make her, that's all. I did think Kittie liked me a good bit. She always acted as if she did, at any rate. I hate to have her throw me down, but what's the use of kicking?"

He was too proud to write her a second letter, and so Kittie Redwood, who was eagerly and impatiently waiting for Fred to write and let her know where he was, and what he was doing, felt sad on her part at his silence.

She, in common with everybody else in that part of the Catskills, had heard the story which Tom Gardner had industriously circulated about Fred's wickedness in robbing the mail.

Miss Pillsberry, to whom the postmaster had made good the $50 for fear that a complaint on her part would cause him to lose the post-office, had nothing to say against the supposed culprit when questioned on the subject.

Although there was no doubt at all that Fred had run away, and that the $50 had disappeared at the same time, which was naturally a suspicious circumstance against the boy, she maintained that the evidence against Fred was not conclusive.

Other people, however, after listening to Mr. Gardner's story, backed up by sundry details furnished by Tom, were of a different opinion.

In fact, about the only persons who really appeared to believe in Fred's innocence were Miss Pillsberry and Kittie Redwood.

Tom lost no opportunity to make the situation as black as he could against the runaway, and his efforts in this direction were more or less successful.

After a time it came to be noticed that the postmaster's son was spending more money than he was ever known to spend before.

To account for this he gave out here and there that he was now chief clerk for his father and was in receipt of a regular wage.

His unusual liberality, however, did not increase his personal popularity, and when he found that fact out he began to sour on the village and asked his father to let him go to New York, where he felt sure he would be more appreciated.

Mr. Gardner, however, objected strenuously to his departure.

Tom then grew cranky, and made himself quite objectionable to the customers of the store.

His father stood this until his patience gave out, and one night he gave his hopeful heir a sound beating.

Tom went to bed vowing vengeance on his parent.

Next morning he was missing, and so was a roll of notes Mr. Gardner had placed the evening before in his bureau drawer.

The inference was plain.

His father tried to locate him, and even went so far as to notify the police authorities of New York to be on the lookout for him, but nothing came of it.

Tom, suspecting the tactics his parent might adopt, did not come to New York at that time, but hid himself to Philadelphia, and so all trace of him was lost.

CHAPTER IX.

THE MAN WITH THE OILY TONGUE.

Fred had been attached to the bellboy staff of the Hotel DeLux for about a year, and was now a fine, handsome boy of fifteen, when he was sent one afternoon to Room 38, on the second floor, with a pitcher of ice-water.

Knocking at the door, he was told to come in.

Entering, he placed the pitcher on a small marble-top table.

The occupant of the room was standing by one of the windows looking out on the street.

He thrust his hand into his pocket and pulled out a quarter.

"Here, boy," he said, holding out his hand.

Fred advanced to receive it, and found himself face to face with Senator Smith.

The senator noticed his look of surprise and hesitation after he had accepted the money, and said:

"Well, do you wish to say anything to me?"

"You are Senator Smith, aren't you?"

"That's my name."

"I think you were stopping at the Chilton Farm, in the Catskills, near the village of Alton, this time last year, sir?"

"I was," replied the senator, in some surprise, regarding the boy searchingly.

He did not recognize Fred, however, which is not singular, seeing it was at night he had caught his only glimpse of the boy, and he was half drunk at the time.

"You don't remember me," replied Fred; "but I recollect you. I was living at that time with Mr. Gardner, the postmaster. I was bringing the mail on our wagon from Undercliff one night and I saw you sitting on an old decayed tree in the gorge. You said you had been taking a walk and had lost your way. You didn't want to return to the Chilton Farm that night, and you asked me to take you to the Stag Inn, in the village, which I did. I don't know whether you remember the circumstance or not, as it took place about a year ago."

Senator Smith looked intently at Fred for a moment or two without speaking.

"I recollect the circumstance to which you allude. You did me a great favor, young man. I wanted to see you again, but found you had left the village rather suddenly. Can I do anything for you now? If so, don't hesitate to speak out."

"No, sir. But I wanted to call your attention to the fact that you dropped $50 in bills into my pocket that night. Now, that is a lot of money for a person to pay for such a small service as I rendered you on that occasion. Besides, I didn't want to be paid for doing you the favor. I don't think you were aware that you gave me so much money; therefore I wish you'd let me return it to you."

"Return it to me!" in an astonished tone.

"Yes, sir. I don't think I have any right to keep it."

"Look here, young man, I gave you that $50 to keep mum about a certain matter. In plain words, you found me partly under the influence of liquor, and I didn't want that fact to leak out. I remember now that I put the money into your jacket pocket because you refused to accept it when I offered it to you."

"I found it that night, and if I had not left the village as suddenly as I did, I should have called on you and handed it back. I should like to do so now."

"Nonsense! I couldn't think of taking that money back. I have more money than I know what to do with."

"But, sir, $50 is a lot of money for you to——"

"Tut, tut! Don't say another word about the matter. You earned the money all right. I always try to pay in proportion to the service rendered me. Fifty dollars was a mere bagatelle—I should liked to have given you more—but it happened to be all I had about me at the time. If you've kept that money ever since for the purpose of returning it when you met me, you've done a very foolish thing. The money is absolutely yours, so don't worry about it any more."

With these words the senator gently pushed Fred toward the door.

There was a small yard behind the hotel, where the covered barrels of refuse were kept, and where other odds and ends in the way of boxes and crates were stored pending removal.

An alley led from one end of this yard into Twenty-second street.

A few days later, about eight o'clock in the morning, Fred, who was off duty at that time, entered the yard and crawled in among a pile of crates close to the rear wall of the hotel.

One of the guests on the sixth floor had accidentally dropped a valuable ring out of her window and she had asked the boy to try and find it.

Fred hoped to be able to recover the ring, as it would be a $10 bill in his pocket.

He crawled around behind the crates, and felt as far under their sides and ends as he could insert his fingers.

He had about come to the conclusion that the ring had fallen into one of the excelsior-filled crates when, to his intense satisfaction, he discovered it snugly imbedded in a small hole in the flaggging close to the hotel wall.

At that moment he heard the subdued tones of a man and woman in eager conversation within a foot or two of where he knelt.

He would have thought nothing of this circumstance but for the fact that he heard the man mention the name of Senator Smith and ask his companion what was the number of his room.

"It's 38, on the second floor," she replied.

"And what floor do you work on, Sallie?" he inquired.

"The second."

"You have a pass-key for all the rooms on that floor, haven't you?"

"For all on the south and west corridors."

"Do you look after No. 38?"

"Yes; Nellie Jones and I—the chambermaids work in pairs—do up that room."

"And I suppose the senator tips you liberally, doesn't he, Sallie?"

"We ain't got no cause for complaint," replied Sallie.

"He seems to carry a lot of money around with him?"

"He's rather careless with it. Nellie found a $10 bill behind the table the other morning."

"Did she whack up with you?"

"No. She returned it to him that afternoon."

"The deuce she did! What did you let her do that for? The Senator never would have missed it."

"Well, he gave her $5 for her honesty, and she gave me half of that."

"Honesty be blowed!" growled the man. "Nobody gains anythin' by bein' honest. I tried it for a while and came in for the short end of everythin'. Now, look here, Sallie, you want to keep in with me, don't you?"

"Of course I do."

"That's right. You're a fine girl, Sallie. I'm goin' to take you to the Island next Sunday afternoon."

"Do you mean that?" asked the girl in a delightful tone.

"Sure I do. But I need the dough to give you a bang-up time. I want you to show me up the back way to the second floor, and let me into Senator Smith's room this afternoon when he's out. I dare say there's some money to be found in his clothes. And maybe I could get a peep into his trunk without him ever findin' it out. That'll put me in funds, Sallie, and there won't be nothin' too good for you on the Island Sunday. What do you say?"

"Oh, I don't know, Jimmie. It's an awful risk," replied the girl, doubtfully.

"Risk be jiggered, Sallie. Besides, it won't be your funeral if anythin' happens. I'm about as fly as they come, girlie, and it won't be the first time I've worked the game. Nor the second, either. You'll help me now, won't you?"

"I'd like to, but——"

"Oh, come now, Sallie, don't be squeamish. I could put my finger on several of the girls who would give their eyeteeth for the chance to do me a favor like this. There's Annie Egan now——"

"Don't mention that deceitful thing!" cried the girl, angrily. "I hate her!"

"She thinks a heap of me, all right," chuckled Jimmie.

"Do you like her?" asked Sallie, in a jealous tone, tapping the pavement of the yard with the toe of her shoe.

"Not as well as I do you. You're a good deal better lookin' than she is, but she'd do most anythin' to get me away from you. She'd let me into any room on her floor if I asked her, and give me full swing to pick up anythin' I could find. But I'm givin' you the first chance, Sallie. You stand in with me and you can put it all over Annie Egan. If I can make a haul out of the senator I'll buy you some swell clothes, so that Annie won't be one, two, three in it with you."

"I'd like to put her nose out of joint, the spiteful thing!" cried Sallie, venomously.

"You kin do it all right by stickin' to me. If she sees you goin' to the Island with me next Sunday sh'll be so mad that——"

"I'll do anything to get the best of her," said Sallie, in a compressed voice.

"That's the way to talk, my charmer. I've found out that the senator is goin' to a caucus this afternoon at three. I'll be on hand here at that hour. You just take me up to his room and trust me, and I'll lift enough, either in money or somethin' else, to give you the time of your life and make all the other girls bite their tongues out with envy. Is it a go?"

The girl thought a moment, as if weighing the chances; then she said:

"I'll do it, Jimmie. I'll do anything for you if you'll drop Annie Egan and let me be your steady."

"It's a bargain," replied Jimmie, promptly. "After this you're the only pebble on the beach with me."

The chambermaid permitted the sneakthief to kiss her, and then the two parted.

"Gee whiz!" exclaimed Fred. "That's a pretty slick rascal. He's filled that girl clean up to the eyes with soft-solder. I don't believe he cares a rap for her outside what he can make through her help. There are some pretty tough specimens in New York, bet your life! It's up to me to queer his little game, and I'm going to do it all right. I'll just hand him out the surprise of his life."

Fred crawled out from behind the crates, went into the hotel and dusted himself off, and then marched up to the sixth floor to return the ring to its owner.

For this service he received a reward of $10.

CHAPTER X.

AT THE POINT OF THE PISTOL.

It was Fred's plain duty to notify the manager of the hotel of the conversation he had overheard, and let him take measures to catch the sneakthief and deal with the chambermaid as he thought best.

The boy, on the contrary, thought that it would be a big feather in his cap if he caught the man himself.

The question was how could he put his plan into successful execution.

His idea was to get into the senator's room and lay in wait for the crook.

When he showed up he meant to capture him red-handed, with the goods on him, and appropriate all the credit for the performance.

Before he went on duty that afternoon Fred borrowed a revolver from one of the porters.

"I wonder how I'm going to get into room 38 when the time comes for me to make a move? To get possession of the key after Senator Smith has left it at the desk seems to be out of the question. I may have to tell the manager, after all."

One o'clock came and Fred hadn't got any nearer solving the problem of getting into room 38 on the quiet.

As the clock struck the hour there was a call on the annunciator from room 38, and Fred was sent up to find out what Senator Smith wanted.

He had a visitor in his room and he wanted a bottle of a choice brand of whisky, a siphon of seltzer and four glasses.

Fred filled the order and got a quarter for himself.

At two o'clock there was another call from room 38, which Fred answered.

Senator Smith wanted a couple of cigars of the fifty-cent brand, as his supply was exhausted.

The boy noticed that both the senator and his friend were pretty well corned and in quite a jovial mood.

Fred got the cigars, fetched the change for the $5 bill, and was leaving the room when the senator called him back.

He was hunting in his pocket for another tip, and not finding any loose change he pushed a $1 bill at Fred.

"Never mind, Senator Smith, it's all right," the boy said, not wishing to accept such a large tip on top of the previous one for so small a service.

"Take it, young man," insisted the big politician. "Besides, I want you to do me a favor."

"All right, sir," replied Fred, picking up the bill.

"Get my gray suit from the closet and help me on with it."

Fred had quite a job assisting the senator to peel off his brown suit and put on his gray garments.

After he had got them on and looked at himself in the glass he changed his mind again and wanted to go back to the brown suit.

His friend, however, objected.

"It's half-past two now," he said. "You haven't time to make another change. We must be off, for we're due at the Waldorf-Astoria at three sharp."

"All right, old man," said the senator, clapping his visitor on the back. "Come along. Here, young man," to Fred, "lock my door and take the key to the desk. Understand?"

"Yes, sir," replied Fred, eagerly, grasping the key.

As soon as the two gentlemen were out of the room he locked the door and followed them to the elevator, where he left them boarding the cage, and started apparently for the stairs.

He hung around the corridor for ten minutes, to make sure that Senator Smith and his friend had gone; then he returned to room 38, unlocked the door, entered and relocked it after him, taking the key out and putting it in his pocket.

"Now where shall I hide?" he asked himself.

He thought the closet would be a good place, but on second thought rejected it because the expected thief might come there first of all, and Fred wanted to allow him to get down to business before he interfered.

The only other available hiding-place was the bed, and under that Fred crawled with the revolver in his hand, and then lay very still awaiting developments.

Twenty minutes passed away on leaden wings to the concealed boy, and he was getting tired of his monotonous position when he heard a key rattle in the lock.

A woman entered the room, cautiously followed by a smoothly-shaven, youngish man, who snatched the bunch of keys from the lock, relocked the door on the inside and then glanced around the apartment with a sharp eye to business.

Fred could only see the lower part of the woman's dress and the man's trousers from where he lay.

"Now do hurry, Jimmie," begged the chambermaid, whose voice the boy recognized as belonging to Sallie.

"Don't you worry. No one will come here," he replied, sharply. "I watched Senator Smith and another gent board a downtown Broadway car. He won't be back for a couple of hours at least."

"But I'm awfully nervous, Jimmie," protested Sallie.

"Oh, brace up! What's the matter with you? I thought you had some spunk," said the young crook, contemptuously.

Fred worked himself forward so as to bring his face near the edge of the bed, and, judging from their positions that they were not looking in his direction, he ventured to stick his head out and take a look at the intruders.

The girl Sallie he immediately recognized as a trim, good-looking young woman with whom he had often exchanged words when they met in the hotel basement.

She had been employed in the house about eight months. Her companion was a squarely-built man of perhaps thirty years.

He was fairly well dressed, his sack coat being buttoned up to his throat.

His movements were quick and to the point.

At the moment Fred glanced out from under the bed he was taking up the Senator's trousers from the chair where the boy had laid them.

He ran his deft fingers into the pockets, but found nothing.

He cast the pants over the back of the chair, with a smothered imprecation, and then turned his attention to the coat.

The outside pockets yielded nothing, and again he swore under his breath, while his fair confederate looked on with some trepidation, for, being new to this kind of business, she was clearly very much frightened lest some accident should reveal their presence and purpose in the room.

Holding up the coat, which was a handsomely-made garment lined with silk, the crook thrust his long, slender hand into an inside pocket.

Instantly a different expression came over the man's face, and he drew out a package of papers and a crumpled roll of bills.

He glanced at the papers hurriedly and dropped them into a side pocket; then he turned his attention to the notes.

"This is something like it," he said, with a grin of satisfaction, for he noticed that the upper bill was a yellow-back with a big 50 on it.

Fred thought it was high time for him to take a hand in the proceedings, so he crawled partially out from under the bed, and, covering the rascal with his revolver, cried:

"Drop that coat and money—quick!"

The crook started back as though he had received a galvanic shock, and glared savagely at the boy, like some wild animal at bay, while the chambermaid threw up her hands with a shriek of dismay and promptly fainted.

CHAPTER XI.

HOW FRED MOUNTS ANOTHER RUNG IN THE LADDER OF SUCCESS.

The thief mechanically dropped the coat, but his talon-like fingers held on to the bills.

As Fred wormed himself out from under the bed his attention was for a moment distracted from the crook.

The fellow made instant use of his momentary advantage by thrusting the money into his pocket and springing for the door.

Before he could touch the bunch of keys hanging in the lock Fred shouted:

ridor and descended the stairs, intending to leave the house by the kitchen door.

He meant to walk nine miles to the station below the one at which he had been accustomed to get the mail, and where people alighted who were coming to Alton and the immediate vicinity of the village.

When he reached the foot of the stairs, however, he was somewhat startled to see a light in the far end of the store.

He knew no light was burned in the store after Mr. Gardner retired for the night, and his curiosity induced him to tiptoe his way to the door of the passage and glance in to see why the light was burning.

His impression was that the storekeeper had come downstairs to get something he wanted, though that was a most unusual hour for him to do such a thing.

The light, a dim one, proceeded from a candle on the counter behind the letter boxes, and Fred was amazed to see Tom Gardner looking over a bunch of letters he had taken from one of the pigeon-holes.

"What is he up to?" Fred asked himself, as he stood and watched his movements.

He saw the boy take one letter from the bunch, lay it upon the counter, after carefully examining the address and weighing it in his fingers, and then return the others to the hole whence had taken them.

Tom acted as if he was doing something he knew to be wrong, for he looked all around the store, and especially to the open doorway, in the shadow of which Fred stood, before he made another move.

Apparently reassured, he took a knife from his pocket and began to slit open the envelope he had laid aside.

"This doesn't look just right to me," mused Fred. "He seems to be opening a letter that does not belong to him. Whose letter can it be, and what does Tom want to find out?"

At the distance he was away from the spot where Tom stood he could form no idea of the real meaning of affairs, and he began to consider the advisability of getting closer, if only to prevent the storekeeper's son from doing something he would afterward have reason to regret.

Although Tom had never treated him with the least degree of kindness or consideration, and had that very evening given an exhibition of the petty malice he bore against him, still he had no hard feelings against his young enemy and would have been ready to do him a favor as soon as not.

Fred couldn't help suspecting that Tom was bent on some mischief.

Not unlikely he bore a grudge against the person to whom the letter was addressed, and he was now working some sneaking scheme to satisfy his spite.

"I should like to find out to whom that letter belongs, and then I would try to put him on his guard against the trap, whatever it is," thought Fred, as he watched Tom's actions.

Tom opened the letter and took out the enclosure.

"My gracious!" exclaimed Fred. "That looks like money."

The boy tossed the envelope and what seemed to be a letter on the counter and then, after another cautious look about the store, he began to count what Fred was confident was a small wad of money.

Tom put the money in his pocket, then took up the letter and deliberately burned it in the flame of the candle, to Fred's intense amazement.

He was proceeding to do the same with the envelope when Fred's grip slipped out of his hand and struck the floor with a bang.

Tom started as though stung by some poisonous insect, uttered a cry of dismay, and upset the candle on the floor.

The store was plunged into intense darkness, and a stillness like death fell upon the place.

Tom, almost frightened out of his senses, didn't dare to move for the moment, lest he betray his presence where he had no right to be at that hour.

He imagined that his father was coming into the store, and he knew that if he was caught there he could give but a lame explanation, which would tell blackly against him when an investigation was started about the missing letter he had just been feloniously handling.

A vision of the village lock-up, and something worse beyond, flitted across his terrified brain, and he fairly trembled in his shoes.

Fred, on the contrary, was wondering what he ought to do.

He was a bit alarmed, lest the noise might have awakened Mr. Gardner, and he more than half expected to hear him coming downstairs at any moment.

His first plan was to retreat by the kitchen door, according to his original plan, while he had yet time; but that would be to leave Tom in possession of his ill-gotten money.

Small as had been Fred's opinion of Tom Gardner, he never dreamed the boy was capable of committing such a daring theft as that which he had just witnessed.

He was aware that Tom was a rank coward, so he determined to work on his fears and make him confess to whom the money belonged, as well as compel him to give up his spoils.

With this idea before him he put down the grip, which he had snatched up again and softly advanced into the store, his stocking-feet making no sound.

He knew where there was a match safe, so reaching for a match, he struck it, and as it flared up Tom gave a scream of fright and ducked under the counter.

Fred walked forward, picked up the candle from the floor and lit it.

On the counter lay the ashes of the burned note, and beside them the partly consumed envelope.

He looked at the superscription and was staggered to discover that the envelope was addressed to Miss Tabitha Pillsberry.

The letter had arrived by that night's mail, then, and it had not been registered.

Like a flash, he remembered that the spinster had told him she had mentioned to Tom, the afternoon before, that she expected a letter containing $50.

So the young rascal had been on the watch for it with sinister intentions.

He put the mutilated envelope in his pocket, and, leaning over the counter, said:

"Come out of there, Tom. I know you're there, for I saw you dive under a moment ago. Show yourself, or I'll call your father."

That threat was merely a bluff, as Fred, from motives of policy, had no intention of arousing Mr. Gardner.

It had its effect, however, for Tom Gardner, with a chalky countenance and widely distended eyes, emerged from his place of concealment.

"So, Tom, I never thought you had the wickedness and nerve to rob the mail," said Fred sternly.

"Who says I robbed the mail?" gasped Tom. "It's a lie! I didn't do no such thing."

"It won't do, Tom. I saw you. I was watching you all the time from the entry doorway. I saw you take the bunch of letters from out of a box, examine them, select the one addressed to Miss Tabitha Pillsberry, open it, take a wad of money from it, which you put in your pocket, and then burn the letter and start to burn the envelope when I dropped my grip, which startled you so that you upset the candle. Isn't that the truth?"

Tom, realizing that he had been detected in the act, had nothing to say in his own defence.

"Now, then," went on Fred, "what are you going to do about it?"

"If you tell dad he'll lick me," whispered the convicted youth, in great terror.

"I guess you deserve a first-class whaling for what you've done," replied Fred, having no sympathy for the little rascal. Suddenly a happy idea struck Tom, and his countenance brightened up.

"Say, Fred, don't say anythin' about this and I'll give you half the money," he said eagerly, diving one hand into his trousers pocket and bringing up the money which had been sent to Miss Pillsberry.

"Well, you're a nice little scamp to make such a proposition to me. Just as if I would accept a penny of money that didn't belong to me."

"No one will know anything about it. There's fifty dollars in this roll. I'll give you twenty-five. You can buy a lot of things with that."

"If this was daytime I'd give you a licking myself for suggesting such a thing to me. I'm not a thief, Tom Gardner."

"Ho!" sneered Tom. "You needn't be so stuck up about it. I'll bet you'd copper the whole thing if you had got first shy at it."

"You little lying rascal, how dare you say that?" cried Fred angrily.

"Do you mean to give me away, after all?" asked the storekeeper's son, with a snarl. "You'll wish you hadn't, that's all."

"Will I?"

"Yes, you will," doggedly.

"I guess not. You don't seem to realize what a serious thing you've done. The government will take this thing in hand and make you sweat pretty lively for what you've done."

Tom turned livid with apprehension.

"Stop where you are or I'll shoot you as sure as your name is Jimmie!"

The rascal paused.

"Now back away from that door," ordered the bell-boy, sternly.

The sneakthief hesitated.

"Do as I tell you, or I'll put a ball into you. This is the last time I'll warn you," said Fred, in a tone that showed he meant business.

The crook concluded it was the part of prudence to obey this command, but he did it with a very ill grace.

Fred backed up to the wall where the electric button communicating with the office was, and pushed it.

"Get into the center of the room, Mister Jimmie," said the boy, as he moved over to the door, stepping across the unconscious chambermaid to reach it, keeping both his eye and the muzzle of his revolver on the sneakthief.

The rascal had no alternative but to obey if he didn't wish to risk stopping a bullet.

Fred unlocked the door and waited.

In a few moments a knock came at room 38.

Fred opened the door and found one of his companions there.

The boy gaped in astonishment as he glanced into the room.

"Is the manager in his office?" asked Fred.

"I don't know," answered the other bell-boy, with a startled look as his eye roved from Fred's revolver to the motionless girl on the floor.

His impression was that his associate had shot her, and he began to back away in great alarm.

"Send the manager up here, Billy," said Fred, sharply. "Or if he's out tell the head clerk to come up."

Billy was off like a shot, and he flew down the stairway to the office as if a mad dog was at his heels.

He certainly delivered Fred's message after his own fashion, for not only the manager, but the head clerk and the proprietor as well, came rushing up to room 38.

"What's happened here?" demanded the manager.

Fred explained the situation in a very few words.

"Go down and send our detective up here," said the manager to the head clerk.

"I give in," spoke up the crook, as the clerk left the room.

"Then put the money and those papers you have in your pocket on that table," ordered Fred.

The thief obeyed.

The manager advanced and took charge of Senator Smith's property.

In a moment or two the hotel detective appeared, and the manager ordered him to take the crook to the Tenderloin station, on West Thirtieth street, and make the proper charge against him.

"Now, Bowers," said the manager, "you've done the house a good service, and I'll see that you're suitably rewarded for your zeal."

Both he and the proprietor shook hands with the boy and complimented him on his pluck.

"Now, go and bring the housekeeper here."

Fred found that lady up in the linen-room, and she promptly obeyed the manager's summons.

"Bring that young woman to her senses, and then lock her up in her room," said the manager. "When our detective returns from the station he will have a talk with her."

"I suppose I may now return to my regular duties, sir," said Fred, looking at the manager.

That gentleman nodded, and the bell-boy went downstairs and took his accustomed seat as if nothing had occurred.

The other bell-boys were in a fever of excitement, and the moment Fred appeared they began to question him with the greatest eagerness.

He had very little to say beyond stating that he had caught a sneakthief in room 38.

"Then you didn't shoot Sallie Dunn?" cried Billy, the bell-boy who had answered Fred's ring and afterward spread his startling impressions of what he had seen in room 38 before the other boys.

"I should think not."

"What was she lying on the floor for, looking as white as a ghost?"

"She had fainted."

"But what made her faint?" persisted Billy.

"Yes, what was the matter with her?" chorused the other boys.

"Oh, you fellows want to know too much," grinned Fred.

"Ain't you going to tell us?" they asked in a disappointed tone.

"I don't believe the manager would care for me to say anything more about this affair, just now, at any rate."

That's all Fred would say, and they had to make the most of it.

As soon as Senator Smith returned to the hotel and heard what had happened in his room, he sent for Fred.

"You seem to be always doing something for me, young man. You saved $600 of my money and a package of negotiable securities, I was so careless as to leave in my clothes, worth $10,000. I shall divide the money with you," and he handed Fred $300 in bills.

The boy knew there was no use of refusing the present, so he took it and thanked the big politician.

"Tut, tut! I don't want any thanks. You've fairly earned all I have given you. I am going to keep my eye on you, Bowers. You seem to be as smart as boys come. I may be able to put something in your way yet that will be better than your present job. I like to help boys of your caliber to get on."

Next morning the manager called Fred into his office and presented him with $250 as an evidence of the proprietor's appreciation of his services.

"I'm not doing so bad in New York," said Fred to himself that night, as he contemplated the balance of $750 to his credit in the Dime Savings Bank. "I've only been in the city a year and started this account with that $50 the senator gave me up in Alton. If I keep on at this rate I'll soon become a small capitalist. I guess I get twice as many tips as any boy in the house. I think Jim Bates (the head bell-boy) has got as much out of me as he's going to get. If he can get me fired now he's welcome to try it on; but it's my opinion he knows better than to try it."

Fred had to appear at the trial of Jimmie Hogan, the sneakthief, and that light-fingered individual got three years up the river for his essay at the Hotel DeLux.

As for Sallie Dunn, the management did not prosecute her as an accomplice of the crook, but simply discharged her without a reference.

After that Fred was in high feather with the house, and three months later, when the head bell-boy took a job at another hotel he was promoted to fill his shoes.

Fred immediately gave his subordinates to understand that he did not intend to hold them up on tips, as had been the custom of his predecessor, but that they could keep every penny that came their way.

In consequence he jumped a hundred per cent. in popularity among his associates, who from that moment were ready to swear by him and stick by him through thick and thin.

Fred's bank account grew more rapidly than ever now that he was promoted to the important position of head bell-boy, and before the holidays came around his balance had risen to four figures, which was a very comfortable reflection for a boy not yet sixteen, who had passed most of his life as a thankless and unpaid drudge in a country store.

CHAPTER XII.

KITTIE REDWOOD.

One New Year's eve Fred Bowers and Billy Butler went to a popular theater to see a spectacular production which was having a big run.

"It's the finest show on earth," exclaimed Billy, emphatically, when they came out into the night at the close of the show.

"It's all right. Fulger is a peach, isn't he?" remarked Fred.

"Bet your life he is. Wasn't that rag-time song with the human rainbow behind him great?"

"What do you mean by the human rainbow, Billy?" asked Fred, in some astonishment.

"Why, those girls, of course. What else should I mean? Don't you remember? Blue calcium lights were thrown on one row, red on another, green on a third, pink on a fourth, and so on. There must have been more'n a hundred girls on the stage, and when they came to the last line of the chorus, and with Fulger in the lead, they danced simply swell! How the house did come down! Hello! What are you looking at?"

Fred had stopped suddenly on the edge of the gutter, where the snow lay in patches, and was gazing down at some object which glistened in the gaslight.

He bent down and picked it up.

It was a magnificent gold-enameled badge, studded with thirty-five diamonds.

Suspended from it by two tiny gold chains of exquisite workman's head was a tiger's head, whose mouth held a large diamond, and whose eyes were formed by a pair of blazing rubies.

"Gee! What a find!" gasped Billy. "I'll bet that's worth a thousand dollars."

"It seems to be very valuable," said Fred, holding it up so that the light of a street lamp could shine upon it. "Watch those diamonds sparkle."

"I'll bet the gazabo that lost that is pulling his hair out by the roots by this time," said Billy, rather envious of his companion's good fortune. "What are you going to do with it? Sell it?"

"Not on your life. I'm going to try to find the owner."

"You are!" exclaimed Billy. "How are you going to do it?"

"It is sure to be advertised for in the 'Lost and Found' column of some paper. If I should miss it through that channel I'll advertise it myself in a way that only the owner will identify it."

"You ought to rake in a big reward. If it was me I wouldn't give it up unless the geezer who was so careless as to lose it came down with a good wad."

"Billy, that wouldn't be a square deal. A man's property is his property, and there isn't any law compelling a person to reward the finder of a lost article."

"S'posen there isn't. He ought to do it just the same. The chances are that anybody but you wouldn't give that badge up unless he saw something at the other end."

"I shan't refuse a reward if it's offered; but I'm not going to hold the owner up for it, even if I had the chance to do so."

"Huh!" grunted Billy, as they walked on down Broadway toward their hotel.

Next morning a notice describing the lost badge appeared in a morning's paper.

A "suitable reward" was offered for its return.

Billy Butler saw it first, as he was on the lookout for it.

"I wonder what that geezer means by a suitable reward?" he sniffed. "A fiver, perhaps. I'll bet that badge is worth $1,000 if it's worth a cent. That diamond alone in the tiger's mouth ought to be worth $500, not to mention the other thirty-five, and the rubies, which are worth as much as diamonds. A feller who can afford to sport such a thing as that must be well heeled, and should come up with the dust."

He showed the advertisement to Fred.

"There you are now. The chap who lost the badge offers a suitable reward," with a grin. "I don't take any stock in suitable rewards. I like a feller to come out and say what he's willing to give. You ought to get $100. It's worth every nickel of it."

Fred read the advertisement.

It was signed "George Wakeley, Hotel Balmoral, Broadway and ——— street."

"I'll call on Mr. Wakeley this afternoon, and return him his badge, after he has properly identified it," said Fred, cutting out the advertisement and putting it in his pocket.

Fred stepped up to the desk at the Hotel Balmoral at half-past four o'clock.

"Is Mr. Wakeley in?" he inquired.

The clerk looked at the key boxes and then said:

"I really couldn't say if Mr. Wakeley himself is in his rooms. Just wait a moment. What is your name? Does Mr. Wakeley know you?"

"My name is Fred Bowers. I am not acquainted with Mr. Wakeley. I came in reference to his advertisement about a badge he lost."

"Oh, yes. He'll be glad to see you."

The clerk made a memorandum on a card and sent it by a bell-boy to Mr. Wakeley's rooms.

The boy returned with word that Fred Bowers was to come upstairs.

"The bell-boy will show you to Mr. Wakeley's rooms," said the clerk, and Fred followed him to third floor front.

"Walk in," said a sonorous voice in answer to the boy's knock.

The bell-boy opened the door, and Fred walked into a splendidly furnished sitting-room.

He found himself in the presence of a finely built man, with a bronzed complexion, who looked as if he had spent the greater part of his life in the open air and under a warm sun.

His face, which bore a hearty and genial expression, attracted the boy at once.

He had the swing and freedom of the untrammelled wilderness, yet at the same time the manners and polish of a perfect gentleman.

"Your name is Fred Bowers, I believe?" he said, looking at the penciled card.

"Yes, sir."

"Mine is George Wakeley. I am happy to know you. Take a seat."

"I called in reference to your advertisement," began Fred, as he sat down.

"Exactly. I lost a very valuable badge last evening on my way to this hotel from the Amsterdam Theater. I set great store by it—in fact, I value it far beyond its intrinsic worth, which is considerable—because it was presented to me by the city of Santiago, Chili. I presume you found it, or represent the person who did so, therefore I will give you an exact description of it to establish my right to its ownership."

He described the badge so correctly that Fred had no doubt that it belonged to him.

"I guess it's yours, all right, Mr. Wakeley," he said. "I found it half imbedded in the snow of the gutter about a block from the New Amsterdam. I shall take great pleasure in returning it to you."

He got up and, taking the badge from his pocket, handed it to Mr. Wakeley.

"I am very much obliged to you, young man," said the gentleman, evidently delighted to get his valuable trinket back.

"You are welcome, sir," answered Fred, politely.

"I said in my advertisement that I would give a suitable reward for the return of the badge," said Mr. Wakeley, putting his hand in his pocket.

"I will not refuse any little acknowledgment you may wish to give me, sir; but I hope you will understand that I made no demand on you for any reward. The badge being your property, you are entitled to receive it back without feeling under any obligation to pay me for bringing it to you. It is a satisfaction in itself to be able to return you so valuable an article."

"You are evidently a very honest and conscientious boy," replied Mr. Wakeley, in a pleased tone. "I am very glad to meet such a one in this great city, where every one is for himself without much thought for his neighbor. Were you born and brought up in New York?"

"No, sir. I was born and brought up after a fashion in the Catskills."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the gentleman, regarding the boy with a fresh interest. "What part of the Catskills, may I ask?"

"A village called Alton, near the Cairo & Catskills Railroad."

"Alton!" cried Mr. Wakeley, in surprise. "Did you know the Redwoods that live on a farm a few miles out of that village?"

"I knew them very well indeed, sir," replied Fred, astonished in his turn.

"I am a first cousin of Mrs. Redwood," said Mr. Wakeley. "Will you excuse me a moment?"

"Yes, sir."

The gentleman went into an inner room.

In about five minutes the door was opened and a lovely little vision of chic beauty appeared in the opening.

She looked rather doubtfully at Fred, who returned her gaze with interest.

At first glance it had struck him that there was something familiar about her.

For a moment he could not say what it was.

Then, as she shyly advanced into the room and cocked her pretty head to one side, as a certain person used to do of old, the scales dropped from his eyes, and he recognized her.

"Why, Kittie Redwood, is this really you?" he cried, jumping from his chair and advancing to meet her.

CHAPTER XIII.

MR. WAKELEY GIVES FRED A TOKEN OF HIS APPRECIATION.

"Yes, but I'm not sure that I ought to have come in here to see you," she said, with the same doubtful expression on her face.

"Why not, Kittie? Aren't you glad to see me?"

"Y-es, but I don't think you deserve——"

She paused and looked down at the carpet.

"Don't think I deserve what?" he asked, in some astonishment.

"You promised to call on me before you left Alton, and you didn't do it. Then you said you would write to me and you didn't——"

"But I did write to you, Kittie," he said eagerly. "I wrote to you before I was two weeks in this city, telling you why I was obliged to leave the village in such a hurry that it was impossible for me to see you."

"Why, I never got any letter from you," she exclaimed, looking at him with a different expression on her face. "Did you really write?"

"I did, upon my honor, Kittle. I waited and waited for you to answer it, and when you didn't I——"

"How could I answer when I didn't get your letter, or know where to address you?"

"That, then, accounts for your silence, and I thought you had deprived me of your friendship for the future."

"Just as if I ever would have done that, Fred," she answered, reproachfully.

"I did think it strange that I didn't hear from you, when we were such good friends in the village."

"And I thought you had found somebody you liked better than poor me in the city," with a laugh and a blush.

"No, Kittle," he said, with an honest ring in his voice that assured her that his words were sincere, "I have been over a year and a half in New York, employed in a big hotel, where I see lots of fine girls, and yet I haven't seen one that I could like better than you."

"Oh, Fred, do you really mean that? Aren't you jollying me just a little?" she asked, with a pleased expression.

"I have never said anything to you yet I didn't mean, and I don't think I will begin now. We used to be good friends, and I hope you won't think of shaking me now that you have grown so big and pretty, and are dressed out so fine. Why, Kittle, what are you doing in New York, anyway? And you're stopping at one of the toniest hotels in town, too. I can't understand it."

She laughed merrily.

"Why, I am on a visit. I am staying with Mr. Wakeley and his wife. Mr. Wakeley is mamma's cousin."

"So he told me."

"But how came you to know Mr. Wakeley, Fred?" she asked curiously. "I never was so surprised in my life as I was when he came and told me there was a boy named Fred Bowers in the sitting-room, who had come from Alton and who said he knew our family. I could hardly believe the evidence of my senses. He insisted that I come out and see you, so——"

"You did," interrupted Fred. "Well, I'm right glad you did, for if there is one girl in the world I wanted to see it is you."

"Oh, Fred," she answered, blushing rosily.

"That's the truth," he said, nodding his head in a very positive fashion. "Aren't you glad? Own up, now, Kittle."

"Well, yes. Are you satisfied now?"

"Certainly I am. How long do you expect to remain in New York?"

"Really, I am not sure. Probably a week or so longer."

"Then you'll let me come and see you again before you go back, won't you?"

"I should be glad to have you call. But you didn't tell me how you came to know Mr. Wakeley. He's only been six weeks in New York, and before he came here he spent sixteen years in South America, in Chili. He's a civil engineer and is quite wealthy."

"Well, Kittle, I haven't known Mr. Wakeley more than ten minutes altogether—that is, up to the time he went in yonder room to tell you I was here."

"Why, how is that? How came you to call here?"

Fred then proceeded to tell her how he found Mr. Wakeley's diamond presentation badge in a gutter on Forty-second street, how he had seen Mr. Wakeley's advertisement in the morning paper and how he had called at the Balmoral to return him his property.

"And now," said Fred in a gallant way, "I feel I have been sufficiently rewarded by having met you, Kittle, and in having our little misunderstanding squared up. I haven't felt so happy in a dog's age."

Kittle laughed in a joyous way, as though she, too, was well pleased with the way things had turned out.

Just then Mr. Wakeley entered the sitting-room with his wife, to whom he introduced Fred.

After a short conversation the boy said he guessed he'd have to go.

"You must come and see us again, Fred," said the civil engineer heartily. "Kittle will remain with us a couple of weeks more, I guess, and I dare say you will enjoy seeing her again, as you two are such old friends," and he looked quizzically at the boy. "Now, I want you to take this," he added, handing Fred an envelope. "Do not be afraid—it won't hurt you. It's just a little token of my appreciation of your kindness in so promptly returning my badge."

Thus pressed, Fred accepted the envelope and put it in his pocket.

When he got back to his hotel and examined the contents of the envelope he found a $500 bill.

"How much did you get for returning that badge?" asked Billy Butler at the supper table that evening.

"I got a bill," replied Fred, with a grin.

"Five or ten?" snickered Billy.

"Maybe it was twenty," hazarded his associate.

Fred shook his head.

"Fifty, then?"

"No, Billy, it wasn't fifty, but if you add another nought to it maybe you'll strike it."

"Do you mean to say you got $500?" gasped Billy.

"I do."

"Oh, come off! Show up, and I'll believe you."

Fred took out the envelope and showed him the bill.

"Suffering grasshoppers! I didn't think you'd get more than a tenner. That chap is all to the mustard!"

"He certainly is a fine man. I hope to know him better some day."

"Do you? Gee! I wish you'd give me an introduction."

The boys rose from the table and went upstairs to relieve a pair of their comrades who had the evening off.

CHAPTER XIV.

FRED CLEARS THE CLOUD FROM HIS REPUTATION.

Fred saw Kittle Redford once more before she returned to her home in the Catskills, and at that interview she told him about the charge of robbing the mail which had been brought against him by Mr. Gardner and his son immediately after his hasty departure from Alton.

"Do you mean to say that Mr. Gardner actually accused me of taking Miss Pillsberry's letter?" he exclaimed with a flushed face.

"Yes, Fred, he did. He said he meant to have you arrested and put in prison for it. He even hinted that he suspected you had also taken some of his own property."

"If I had known that I should have returned to Alton at once and faced him. Why, it's an outrage! Tom Gardner took the money out of that letter himself the night I left, for I caught him in the act of doing it."

"You did?"

"I did. And he promised if I would not say a word about it that he would take the money to Miss Pillsberry in the morning and make some explanation that would get him out of the difficulty. So the little rascal kept the money and laid the blame of the whole thing on me, did he? And here I've been ever since supposed to be a thief. Oh, Kittle, this is terrible! What shall I do? I'll have to go back and try and straighten the matter out. I'll make Tom confess, or I'll break his head."

"You can't do that now."

"Why can't I?"

"Because Tom Gardner ran away from Alton a year ago and has not been heard of since."

"Ran away, did he?"

"Yes, and it is believed that he took some of his father's money with him."

"I don't doubt but he did. But, Kittle, I'll have to square myself somehow with the people who know me at the village. I can't have such a charge as that hanging over my head. Did Miss Pillsberry believe I took her money?"

"No, she didn't believe that you did, though the evidence was so strong against you. Neither did I, Fred. Nobody could make me believe anything bad of you."

"Thank you, Kittle. You're a true friend," replied Fred, with much emotion. "What was the evidence that Mr. Gardner and Tom brought against me?"

Kittle told him that Tom asserted that he had seen the sum of $50, the exact amount the letter was supposed to contain, in his possession.

"That was true," replied Fred; "but I received that money from Senator Smith, who was at that time stopping at the Chilton Farm, for a service I rendered him."

"I believe you, Fred; but I do wish for your own sake that you could prove it. That would set you right again."

"I can prove it, Kittle."

"Oh, I'm so glad!" she said.

"Senator Smith is stopping at the Hotel Delux, where I am employed, and he is a good friend of mine. I'll tell him about the matter, and get him to give me a written statement that he actually presented me with that $50 for a service, which need not be mentioned, of course. You can take this back with you and show it to your father and tell him what I saw Tom do. In fact, I will make out a statement myself, in the form of an affidavit, and swear to its truth before a notary. That will be better. Then your father can take both documents to Mr. Gardner and show them to him and also to others in the village. You will do this for me, won't you, Kittle?"

Kittle assured Fred that she would be only too happy to help set him right at the village, so Fred got the senator to give him a signed paper about the $50, and he made out his own affidavit, charging Tom Gardner with the theft of the letter in question, detailing all the circumstances of the case, together with the reasons which induced him to leave Alton in such a hurry.

He took both these papers to Kittle at the Balmoral Hotel, but as she was out shopping with Mrs. Wakeley at the time, he did not see her before he left the city.

She got the papers all right, however, took them back home with her, and her father used them to such good advantage in Fred's behalf that even the postmaster, who was still rather bitter against his son for stealing his money and from whom he had not heard a word since his unceremonious departure from town, admitted that Fred Bowers might be innocent of the charge of stealing Miss Pillsberry's letter.

The maiden lady herself was delighted to learn that Fred was able to prove that he had not taken her letter, and, as she had more than half suspected Tom to be the guilty one all along, she made it her business to circulate the news broadcast.

Kittle made Fred happy with a letter giving the results of her efforts with the papers, and telling him that no one in Alton now had the least doubt as to his innocence in relation to Miss Pillsberry's letter.

Senator Smith evidently had taken a great fancy to Fred, for when he was in the city he always insisted that the boy answer his attendance calls to his room.

As he invariably tipped Fred most liberally, the boy had come to look upon the politician as a gilt-edged cinch.

One day when Fred brought him up a box of his particular grade of Havana cigars, he turned to him and said abruptly:

"How much money have you in the bank, Bowers?"

"About $1,800, sir," replied Fred.

"Pretty good for a young fellow of your age. By the way, how old are you?"

"Sixteen."

"Well, I'm going to put you in the way of making a few dollars."

"I'm very much obliged to you, sir."

"Tut, tut! You're welcome. Now listen to me. The city has condemned the property forming the approaches to the new East River bridge. On Monday the buildings on this ground will be sold at public auction. The tenants have been notified by the city authorities to vacate at once. Now they won't, for they are being quietly tipped off that they can remain for three months by paying their rent regularly. Only certain people on the inside know that the buildings need not be torn down for three months. These people, and I am one of them, are going to attend the auction next Monday and bid in the best of these buildings, and afterwards, when the time is up, we shall sell the buildings at private sale to building removal companies. Now, you had better attend that sale with, say, $1,500, and buy in two or three of them. You'll be able to collect three months' rent, in addition to what they will afterward fetch at private sale. All the money you collect in rent from a five-story tenement will be clear profit, and I venture to say not a building will fetch a price equal to its actual value in old building material. You meet me on the spot at noon, and I'll see that your bids get in on the ground floor with those on the inside."

On the Monday in question Fred arranged so that he was able to get off work in time to meet Senator Smith on the ground where the sale was going to take place.

The senator and his political friends bought in the bulk of the buildings, and three of them were assigned to Fred at an average cost of $400 each.

The clique employed a man to collect the rents for the ensuing three months.

After his share of the expense had been deducted, Fred found that his profits for rent on the three tenements amounted to about $550 per month.

Senator Smith sold Fred's three buildings with his own to a company who made a business of demolishing condemned structures for their material at a further profit to the boy of $850, so that Fred cleared altogether on the deal the sum of $2,500, which raised his capital to nearly $4,500.

CHAPTER XV.

FRED GETS A TIP ON THE STOCK MARKET.

With over $4,000 to his credit in the Dime Savings and Greenwich banks, Fred was eager to increase his financial standing, so that when he reached his majority he would be able to start in some business for himself if he felt so disposed.

He had heard a good deal about fortunes being won and lost, too, for that matter, in Wall Street in a day, and several times he had been tempted to go to one of the branch offices of leading brokers in the vicinity of the hotel and taking a shy at the bulls and bears.

Prudence, however, prevented him, though he continued to make a study of Wall Street methods and talk on the subject with messenger boys and clerks who worked in the financial district.

They often poured glowing stories into his ears, and offered to double for him any money he had accumulated from his tips.

But Fred didn't care to intrust any funds to a second party in so precarious a game of chance.

"If I ever put my money up on stocks," he said to himself one day, "I'll do it first hand. Then I'll know where I'm at even if I lose."

Fred had been a bellboy about two years when one day he was sent to answer a call at Room 98, on the third floor.

This apartment was one of a suite occupied by William Metcalf, a prominent Wall Street speculator, who had only recently become a guest of the house.

The broker sent the boy downstairs to bring drinks and cigars for himself and two friends, and when Fred returned with the order he got a fifty-cent tip.

During the afternoon, which was Saturday, Fred answered rings from Room 98 half a dozen times, and every time he was requested to fetch up drinks or cigars, or both.

It was half-past four o'clock when Fred answered the seventh summons from Room 98.

"This is what I call a good thing," grinned the boy to himself, for each of his trips to the broker's apartments, after the first, had netted him a quarter as he took the elevator for the third floor.

He knocked on the door of Room 98 and was told to enter.

The three gentlemen still sat around a marble-top table in the center of the room, which was littered with papers and cigar stumps.

Their movements, Fred could not fail to observe, were very hazy and uncertain.

Evidently the drinks they had absorbed had affected their brains and clouded their thoughts.

"The chambermaid will have a fit in the morning when she sees this room," thought the bellboy, as he cast a hasty glance around the apartment.

"Look here, boy," said Mr. Metcalf, in a sleepy way. "I want you to go on an errand for me."

"I can't leave the hotel for half an hour yet, sir. I'll call a messenger for you."

"Call nothing," replied the broker, with a slight hiccough. "I want you to carry a message for me yourself. Understand?"

"Yes, sir. I'll do it if you can wait half an hour. I'm off at five."

Mr. Metcalf seemed satisfied to wait that long, and as Fred was turning to leave the room he told him to fetch up some more cigars.

Fred brought the cigars right away and received his sixth quarter, making two dollars in all he had received in tips that afternoon from the new guest.

"Don't forget, boy, five o'clock sharp. Might as well bring up a bottle of seltzer with you when you come. Understand?"

"Yes, sir."

Promptly at five Fred knocked again on the door of Room 98.

"Come in," spoke Mr. Metcalf's voice, in thick tones.

One of Mr. Metcalf's visitors seemed to be making a strong, but not very successful, effort to keep his eyes open, while the other, with a decidedly foolish look upon his face, was apparently trying to check off something with his fingers.

Mr. Metcalf himself was reaching for a paper containing a lot of pencilled memorandums, which had slipped to the carpet just out of his reach.

"Boy, pick up paper, will you?"

Fred recovered it and handed it to him.

The broker held it before his eyes and seemed to be studying it.

Then he got up in an unsteady way, took up a glass and started to fill it with seltzer from the siphon Fred had brought with him, according to orders.

Mr. Metcalf, quite unconscious of the force he was releasing, pressed the lever down hard.

The liquid struck the bottom of the glass like a bullet from a pistol and an artificial geyser immediately resulted.

The stream of seltzer flew in the direction of the sleepy visitor and struck him full in the mouth.

The shock aroused him so suddenly that he tipped backward, chair and all, and measured his length on the carpet.

Fred hastened at once to his assistance and helped him back on his chair, taking his handkerchief from his pocket and wiping away the moisture which had drenched his collar and necktie.

Mr. Metcalf looked astonished at the havoc he had created, while the other gentleman laughed heartily, as if he thought the accident awfully funny.

The broker had dropped the memorandum on the floor again and was examining the metallic top of the siphon as if he thought it was out of order.

He saw the paper on the floor and once more asked Fred to pick it up, which the boy did.

There was a small fancy desk in a corner of the room, and toward this Mr. Metcalf turned.

He opened out the flap and seated himself before it.

Taking a sheet of notepaper, he started to write something on it, but his efforts in this direction were not satisfactory to him.

After spoiling a couple of sheets he turned around and motioned to Fred.

The boy went over to see what he wanted.

"Sit down and write a few words for me, young man."

Fred took the chair the broker vacated.

"Write as I dictate."

"Yes, sir."

"Mr. John Fisher, No. 128 West — street, city.' Got that?"

"Yes, sir."

"Buy P. & M., Monday, without fail. Go your limit. No risk. Sure thing. Sure to go to par inside ten days.' Got that down?"

"Yes, sir."

"Give me pen and I'll sign it."

The broker sprawled his signature at the bottom of Fred's writing and then he told the bellboy to address an envelope to Mr. Fisher, put the note inside and seal it up.

Fred obeyed.

"That's all," said Mr. Metcalf. "Here's a dollar. Take note to Mr. Fisher right away."

The boy went to his room, changed his uniform for his every-day clothes, and then started on his errand, jumping on board a Broadway car.

"I wonder what he meant by 'Buy P. & M., Monday, without fail?'" mused the boy.

Then, like a flash, the meaning of those words formed itself in his brain.

"Why, that must be a stock tip Mr. Metcalf is sending some friend or business associate. P. & M. are the initials of some railroad whose shares are about to advance in the market. Mr. Metcalf probably has inside information on the subject. By George! I'll bet I've hit it. I'll just make a note of those initials. I would not be at all surprised but I have got on to a good thing. The stock, according to the broker, is sure to go to par inside of ten days. I wonder what it is selling at now? I can find that out in the morning. I think I see the chance to make a small wad myself."

As he left the street on which Mr. Fisher lived was reached, and the boy left the car.

He found No. 128 to be an imposing brownstone front.

He mounted the steps, rang the bell and asked for Mr. Fisher.

The gentleman was in his library.

Fred delivered the note into his hands, and a few minutes later was on his way back to the hotel.

CHAPTER XVI.

FROM BELLBOY TO MILLIONAIRE.

Next morning Fred looked up the market report of the previous day's operations at the Stock Exchange, and found that P. & M. was ruling at 66.

"If I see Senator Smith to-day I'll ask his advice on the subject. If he thinks well of it, why, he can go in, too, and get a rake-off. He's been pretty good to me, and I'd like to put something in his way."

After dinner he found that the politician was in his room, so he went up and knocked at his door.

He was told to enter.

"Hello, Bowers. What can I do for you?" asked the senator, genially.

"I want to ask your advice about a little speculation I'm thinking of going into."

"A speculation, eh? Let's hear what it is."

"Mr. Metcalf, the broker, who has suite 98 and 99, on the floor above, sent a note by me to a friend yesterday afternoon advising him to buy a certain stock which he said would advance rapidly before the end of next week."

"That's it, eh?" said the senator, becoming interested. "What was the name of the stock?"

"P. & M., sir."

"How came you to see the contents of the note?"

"I wrote it for him."

"Why didn't he write it himself?"

"He couldn't. He was not feeling well."

"Who was this person, if it isn't a confidential matter?"

"I don't think I ought to mention names. He had promised the tip, and I guessed from his manner that he was expecting it. At any rate, he seemed greatly pleased when he read the note, and he told me to tell him he'd use the tip. He told him to go the limit on it."

"Look here, Bowers, this may be a good thing. If it is I'd advise you to see it through. You wait till to-morrow night. I'll see what I can find out about that stock to-morrow. If it looks to be the correct thing I'll go along myself a few thousand and I'll give you ten per cent. of my winnings in acknowledgment of your letting me in on it. You can also put all your pile on a ten per cent. margin. But don't do a thing till you hear from me."

"All right, sir. I'm much obliged."

Next evening Senator Smith took Fred aside and told him to buy the stock.

On Tuesday morning the boy, after figuring that he would require $3,960 to hold 600 shares of P. & M. on a margin of ten per cent., drew the money from his two banks, took it around to the uptown office of Gage & Co., stock brokers, and put it up on the stock with all the nerve of an old-timer.

The Senator had informed him that he had purchased 5,000 shares for himself down in Wall Street.

Next day P. & M. went up to 68.

On Thursday the stock closed at 73.

Friday morning the stock began to attract such attention at the Exchange that it went up with a rush to 80 before business closed for the day.

Saturday morning it opened at 81 5-8 and closed at 90 at noon.

P. & M. reached par Tuesday morning and Fred rushed over to Gage & Co. and ordered them to sell the stock.

The clerk telephoned to the Exchange and in fifteen minutes Fred was out of it and at liberty to figure up his profits.

Next morning he got his statement and a check for something like $24,000, of which four-fifths represented his profits.

Senator Smith cleared $165,000 on the deal, and he insisted on Fred accepting $16,500 in return for the tip.

Thus the bellboy found that he was worth about $41,000.

It wasn't very long afterward before Fred overheard two real estate men talking about the land boom on Long Island.

"We ought to make a good thing out of it," said one of the men. "It can be bought for something less than $1,000 an acre, and should net us five or six times that amount. We'll have to take the whole thirty-five acres."

"We can get it for it a third down, I suppose?" remarked his companion.

"No. It's spot cash, but we can get a loan of $20,000 on it."

They decided to try and raise enough money to buy the land, then form a company to get the necessary capital for improvements, advertising and other expenses.

Fred had been thinking of investing his money in real estate, and he thought he would consult Senator Smith on the subject.

He repeated to the politician the conversation he had overheard, and once more asked his advice.

The senator found that owing to the newly projected transit facilities the property Fred had told him about was almost certain to become very valuable in a few years, so he decided to take a thirty-day option on the land in his own name in the boy's interest, pending the necessary legal arrangements to have a guardian appointed for the bellboy.

Before the time limit was up the Manhattan Trust Company became Fred's guardian and purchased the property for him for $33,000.

The company received an offer of $40,000 for the property inside of a month, but Fred had no idea of disposing of it.

During the fall Fred paid a visit to Alton, or rather he stopped with the Redwoods on their farm for two weeks and had the time of his life there.

He told Mr. Redwood and Kittie how well he was making out in the world.

"What will you ever do with so much money if you make it?" asked Kittie, with a smile, after her father had left the room.

"When I'm married I guess my wife will find use for some of it."

"Married!" exclaimed the girl, her face changing. "Have you a girl in view?"

"I have," he replied, promptly.

Miss Redwood became very sober and changed the conversation.

"You haven't asked me who she is," said Fred, slyly.

"Some New York girl, I suppose," she replied, with a slight toss of her head.

"New York State girl—yes. But I'm not sure whether she'll have me when the time comes."

"Oh, I guess she will if you have plenty of money," retorted Kittie.

"I had an idea, Kittie, that money wouldn't make any difference with you."

"It won't. If I liked a man well enough to marry him I wouldn't care whether he was rich or not," she said in a tone which showed she meant it.

"That's what I thought, Kittie. Now, supposing I tell you this girl's name, will you keep it quiet?"

"I am not very curious on the subject," she replied, with a little frown.

"Well, you said that pretty decidedly."

"I meant it."

Fred drew a pencil from his pocket and wrote something on a card.

"There's the only girl I care a cent for in this world, and she's the only girl I mean to marry. Read it."

"No. I don't want to know anything about her."

She threw the card on the table and walked over to the window.

He followed her after picking up the card.

"Are you jealous, Kittie?" he asked, putting his arm around her waist.

"No, I'm not jealous," she said, swinging away from him. "I don't care."

"You're crying, Kittie," he said, softly.

"I'm not."

"Yes, you are. Why don't you read the card?"

"Because I don't care to," with an angry sob.

"Allow me to read it for you. The words on that card are 'Kittie Redwood, the sweetest girl in all the world.'"

She looked up in surprise.

Then she snatched the card out of his hand and read it.

"Kittie, will you marry me some day?" asked Fred, eagerly.

"Do you mean that, Fred?" she said, with swimming eyes.

"I do."

"Then my answer is—yes."

"That is all I wanted to know, Kittie. That is what brought me to the Catskills."

He pulled her head down on his shoulder and kissed her.

A few months later Fred ceased to be a bellboy at the Hotel DeLux.

He was promoted behind the desk.

On his twentieth birthday he was formally accepted by Mr. Redwood as his prospective son-in-law, and Kittie declared she was the happiest girl in the world.

On Fred's return to New York he received through the trust company an offer of $75,000 for his Long Island property.

He decided to accept it, and when the money was paid over he wrote Kittie that he was now worth over $100,000.

About this time Mr. George Wakeley paid another visit to New York.

His chief object was to raise additional capital for the purpose of enlarging the operations of a gold and silver mine in Chili in which he had the controlling interest.

He learned that Kittie and Fred were engaged to be married, and he invited the boy, for whom he had a great liking, to dine with him at the Balmoral Hotel.

Fred accepted, and after Mr. Wakeley had found out how successful Fred had been he offered the boy a half interest in the mine for his $100,000.

Fred accepted his offer at once, and arrangements were set on foot to carry out Mr. Wakeley's plans.

"I don't thank you a bit for taking Fred away from me. Cousin George," said Kittie, tearfully, when Mr. Wakeley and Fred, who had resigned from the Hotel DeLux, much to the regret of the proprietor and permanent guests alike, paid a flying visit to the Redwood Farms previous to their departure for South America.

"I dare say you are dreadfully down on me, Kittie," replied the gentleman, soothingly. "But I assure you both Clara and myself will take the best of care of him. Two years won't be long for you to wait, little one. Then he will come after you. By that time he ought to be a very wealthy young man."

"I don't care whether he's wealthy or not, Cousin George. I would marry Fred if he didn't have a dollar."

Fred and Kittie had a very tender parting, and the girl cried for a whole week after he had gone back to New York.

Then Wakeley and Fred sailed for Chili, remaining away two years, after which they came back, Fred having become a millionaire.

It was a very pretty wedding that took place in the Alton Methodist Church, and under a sunshiny sky Fred and Kittie became man and wife.

One of the first to wish the newly-wedded couple long life and happiness was Miss Tabitha Pillsbury, who sent Kittie a sofa pillow embroidered by her own hands.

Senator Smith was also present, and acted as best man for Fred.

He presented the bride with a necklace of pearls.

On their wedding trip they stopped at the Hotel DeLux in New York.

"In my striving for fortune, Kittie," he said to his wife that night, "it seems to have been but a step that I took from bellboy to millionaire."

Next week's issue will contain "OUT FOR BUSINESS; OR, THE SMARTEST BOY IN TOWN."

CURRENT NEWS

Twenty-eight million buttons for the British army were recently ordered in Canada. Canadian factories are producing equipment for the French, Russian and Belgian armies, as well as for the British.

It is estimated that between 250 and 300 miles of khaki cloth and its substitutes, from fifty-four to fifty-six inches wide, are being woven every week in Great Britain for clothing for the British army. One mill alone produces forty miles of cloth weekly.

A paper lifeboat that can be packed away in a space of about one cubic foot, but which, when inflated, is declared to be seaworthy and durable, is the invention of a retired admiral of the Japanese navy. The boat is made from the Japanese paper called "hashikirazu," manufactured from the mulberry tree.

A surf-board—which has been christened a swimming ski—driven by bicycle pedals attached to a motor-boat propeller, with air tanks to keep it afloat, has been used recently on the beach at San Pedro, Cal. The board is shaped like a ski, with the front end curved up. It can be used in the roughest surf and considerable speed can be attained with it.

Wladek Zbyszko, winner of the Paris tournament for wrestlers last year, recently appeared in the county clerk's office of New York and made application for his first citizenship papers. Wladek is one of the most powerful men in the wrestling game. He is only twenty-two years of age and weighs 225 pounds. "I like America and I like the American people," said Zbyszko, "and I want to be one of them. I've been here for a long time now, and I already feel that I am an American."

A tiny electric motor, probably the smallest ever built, was recently exhibited at the University of North Dakota. It weighs thirty-four grains complete, and was constructed by I. T. Needland, a jeweler of Hillsboro, N. Dak. The dimensions of the motor are: Length, .563 inch; height, .291; width, .336 inch; diameter of armature, .071 inch; diameter of commutator, .0106 inch. The armature, which weighs four grains, has six slots and six commutator segments. A 2.5-volt battery supplies the energy.

Thomas J. Macnamara, Parliamentary Secretary of the Admiralty, announced in reply to a question in the House of Commons the other day that 460,628 tons of British shipping, other than warships, had been sunk or captured by the German navy since the outbreak of the war. Mr. Macnamara added: "The number of persons of all nationalities killed in connection with these sinkings is approximately 1,556. The tonnage of German shipping, not sunk or captured by the British navy to May 15 is 311,467 tons. So far as is known, not one German or neutral ship has been killed in connection therewith."

The cannibalistic tendencies of foxes have proved a serious drawback to the valuable fox-raising industry of Prince Edward Island, according to a recent consular report. Not only are the pups frequently eaten by their parents, but females are sometimes killed and partially eaten by their mates. As the adult animals may be worth several thousand dollars a pair, this is a serious matter. A remedy is found in the filing down of the canine and bicuspid teeth of the male fox; this gives the female such an advantage in a fight as to insure her safety, and also minimizes the danger of the teeth of the parent fox being caught in the skin of the pups when playing with them, giving him a taste of blood which tends to make him want more.

It has remained for American brains and American capital to put to practical and profitable use that greatest of all problems of the hot, low countries of Central and South America—the worn-out banana land. Experiments conducted by American planters have shown that hogs pastured on grass and fattened on bananas produce a superior, almost odorless lard and finely flavored meat. Hogs, it has been found, can be raised on the worn-out banana lands and fattened on the small, unmarketable bunches of fruit borne on these areas. So much for the banana land in the course of its deterioration! When bananas may no longer be grown, the land will produce bountiful crops of sugar. Two thousand acres, near Ceiba, Honduras, the banana yield of which was long ago exhausted, has so responded to sugar cultivation that a sugar mill has been erected on the premises by the Honduras Sugar and Distilling Company, at a cost of half a million dollars, to take care of the resulting cane crop.

That the possibility of the United States becoming involved in the European war gives to the naturalization oath administered to would-be citizens of this country a graver significance than it has ever had before was pointed out by Judge John C. Rose to the applicants appearing before him in the United States District Court in Baltimore for examination for naturalization. Judge Rose said: "If any of you to-day take that oath, he pledges himself hereafter to make this country his country and to support it in whatever conflict it may have with the land of his birth. It may involve the sacrifice of some of the dearest and most sacred of human ties. If any one of you take this oath, he binds himself to accept on such questions the decision of the President and Congress of the United States, and he is as much bound by them as is any American, all of whose ancestors for two centuries and a half have dwelt on this side of the Atlantic. If any of you feel that you are asked to undertake more than you can in good faith perform, withdraw your application." There were thirty applicants, and none withdrew. Of those admitted 15 were Russians, 2 Germans, 2 Irishmen, and 1 each from England, Switzerland, Italy, Norway, and Denmark.

JOLLY JACK JONES

—OR—

KNOCKING ABOUT THE WORLD

By ED. KING

(A SERIAL STORY)

CHAPTER IX (continued)

"Knew I would," said Dobbs. "It's all right, Jack. Take this revolver, boy, and we will make a start."

"But Abe?"

"Bah! I don't fear Abe. He's the biggest coward on record. All I want to do is to catch him in the act of swiping that money which was brought in here to-night, and I believe I can do it, too. You just come on. They ought to be asleep by this time, and he will begin to think about getting in his fine work."

"Shan't we want a light?"

"Yes, and we are going to have one. I'll start my pocket electric going again. Cute little thing, isn't it? Jack, you are a brave boy."

"Oh, don't throw boquets at me," replied Jack. "I knew from the first that you were not what you seemed to be."

"Yes, and I knew you suspected me, but you thought I was a burglar, so you went shy of the mark, after all. Come on, boy. Come on!"

Jack now followed Mr. Dobbs out into the long corridor, down the back stairs and into the kitchen again.

The room was dark, and the outer door had been shut and fastened on the inside.

"Only thing now is to make sure Abe don't shoot us from behind," whispered Dobbs. "Keep your eye peeled, boy, and fire if you think necessary. I'll back you up."

They passed out into the hall then, and ascended the main staircase on tip-toe.

"We have five rooms to visit," breathed Dobbs. "We must be as still as death about it, though. Where in thunder is he? I guess he has taken the alarm and gone to bed."

He had scarcely said the word when Jack caught his sleeve and pointed ahead.

A man lay stretched upon the floor further along the corridor.

"Ah!" gasped Dobbs, hurrying forward. "Lay low, Jack! This is Barrett's work!"

Abe proved to be entirely unconscious when they got to him.

There were black marks about his throat—it looked as if he had been choked to death.

"He isn't dead," whispered Dobbs, after hastily bending over him. "Now for the tug-of-war. Stand by, Jack Jones. In a minute there will be something doing. Out goes the light!"

No sooner were they in darkness than Jack began to hear footsteps moving about one of the rooms.

Presently there was the sound of an opening door, and the footsteps were heard at the other end of the hall.

Dobbs trod on Jack's toe.

This was signal enough to make the boy stand ready.

Nearer and nearer came the footsteps, but it was entirely too dark to see who this night prowler was.

Just as the man came opposite to them Dobbs flashed his light.

"Up hands, Black Barton," he shouted. "You double thief! I've got you now!"

It was Barrett.

There he stood with a small bag in his hand.

"Dobbs! Have you gone crazy?" he gasped.

At the same instant there was a rush of feet from the other end of the corridor; lights flashed, and a voice called out:

"This way, boys! This way! Here are the burglars! We've got them now!"

"Bad luck!" hissed Dobbs, and he sprang like lightning at Barrett's throat, pinning him against the wall.

CHAPTER X.

JACK JOGS ALONG OUT WEST.

To Jack's infinite astonishment, when the lights came flashing along the corridor, he saw that they were in the hands of the goat-bearded sheriff, Mr. Sanders, proprietor of the High Rock House, and several other men.

Meanwhile Mr. Dunning Dobbs had snapped a pair of handcuffs on the wrists of the man Barrett, and held him covered with a revolver.

He had thrown back the lapel of his coat also, and a gold detective's shield blazed upon his breast. It was this shield he had shown Jack, which so amazed the boy.

"This way, gentlemen," he called out. "I have trapped the burglars. Here is your man, Mr. Sheriff, and there are four others drunk and asleep in these rooms, and here, Mr. Sanders, is the dough bag. It does not contain all your money, but it does contain part, and the rest can be supplied. Pleased to meet you, gentlemen. My only car coming was rather a surprise."

"Who in thunder are you?" demanded the sheriff. "What's the reason you aren't one of the burglars, too?"

"He is!" cried Barrett. "He is right in with the rest of us, he——"

"Hold on, hold on!" broke in Dobbs. "It won't work. I am Detective Duff of the United States Secret Service, dear friends. This man is one Black Barton, pickpocket, safe blower, all-around thief. In these rooms dead drunk are four more crooks, one a noted counterfeiter. I hold them all under arrest, and I shall arrest any man who interferes with my work."

This was the beginning of a long wrangle.

Jack was simply knocking about the world with his banjo, and by the merest accident had run up against all this business which made such a stir in the newspapers at that time.

Detective Duff at last satisfied the sheriff that he was all he claimed to be.

The bag proved to be filled with jewelry and bank bills, and Barrett had a lot more about him.

The four men asleep in the other rooms had nothing, for Black Barton had been through them all and collected the plunder in the bag.

Abe, who soon came to, turned out to be a treacherous assistant of Detective Duff, whom the detective correctly suspected of being false.

He had been choked by Barton, who no doubt would have killed him if matters had not turned out as they did.

Learning that preparations for counterfeiting on a large scale were on foot, the government ordered him to open up as a Wall street broker and try to get in with the gang.

The plan succeeded. The house in the woods was hired ostensibly for the purpose of starting the counterfeiting plant, and here Duff enticed the five crooks, each of whom had been required to show up a certain large sum of money before being admitted to the "company," which was to turn out the "queer."

A part of this money was paid over to Duff to purchase machinery, etc., the rest remaining with those who brought it in, subject to future call. They were to divide the proceeds of the High Rock Hotel robbery.

During the dinner the shrewd detective had gathered information enough to send all hands to the penitentiary on long terms, and that was where they went.

Fortunately Mr. Sanders was able to identify some of the cash as money stolen from the High Rock House. Diamonds and other gems found on Barrett were also part of the contents of the safe, and these were returned, but the detective was allowed to take his prisoners to New York, as the government had the first claim, and they were wanted for many crimes. The sheriff had traced the thieves to the old house and got the others to go with him to make the arrest.

Abe was discharged from the secret service, and narrowly escaped going to prison with the rest, for his treachery to Duff in his villainous greed to get the thieves' money for himself.

Jack went down the river in the yacht Komado, with Detective Duff and his prisoners.

The detective kept him playing the banjo and singing most of the way, and made as jolly a time of it all as if it had been a picnic.

When they reached New York he gave Jack another hundred, wished him good luck, and let him go on his way, although he urged him to stay by him and go in for detective work.

But Jack refused the offer.

"I'm no detective, and I don't know that I want to be one," he said. "I'm just a poor boy knocking about the world, and I propose to see more of it. I haven't half done my travels yet."

So Jack moved on with his brother, the banjo.

In this way he visited several of the principal cities of the United States. Among these were Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and Cleveland.

At the latter place he put in three weeks with a variety show, for the weather was cold and he wanted to be under cover.

He kept on picking up money here, there and everywhere, and as he had no expensive habits to throw it away on, the fund began to grow until the boy reached a point where he would have very much hesitated to have let any of his chance acquaintances on the road know just how much money he carried about him.

Jack was very particular about this, and although he had a pleasant word for everybody and was just as jolly as ever, he made no close friends.

Jack had done his last turn at the Eureka Music Hall, on Superior street, Cleveland, one cold winter's evening, and was just bagging his banjo preparatory to going to his room, when pretty Minnie Collins, who did a soubrette turn, put her head in through the door and said:

"Hello, Jack! The stage manager says to come to him before you go home."

"All right," replied Jack. "I'll be there. What does he want?"

But as Minnie did not know, of course she could not tell, and Jack had to restrain his impatience until he met the stage manager himself.

"Hello! Have you made up your mind to quit Saturday?" asked the stage manager, when Jack came into his room.

"Yes, sir; just as I told you," replied Jack.

"Sorry for it. Give you another week if you want it."

"No; I'm going on to Detroit. I want to see every city in the United States before I'm through."

"And not a bad scheme, either, for a boy like you," replied the manager. "Well, seeing that I can't hold you I'll do you a good turn, Jack. Here's a letter which came to me by the evening mail. If it's any use to you, why use it. I shouldn't wonder if there would be twenty-five dollars in it at least."

The letter read as follows:

Dear Sir—To-morrow evening I give a little entertainment at my house. The music was to be entirely done by amateurs, but at the last moment our banjolist fell sick and cannot come. Can you supply his place? I should want a young man and a first-class player, of course, and one discreet enough to keep his mouth shut as to whatever he might see or hear. You know me, and——"

The rest of the letter was torn off.

(To be continued)

ITEMS OF INTEREST

SEAWEED AS FOOD.

Irish moss or carrageen is a much branched seaweed, creamy white when dried, which grows upon rocks along the coast of the British Isles, New England and the Northern Pacific.

Iceland moss is not a seaweed, but a lichen growing in boggy moorlands in the Far North; it is eaten by reindeer and also provides food for humans. Like the sea mosses, it makes a delicate jelly.

Another edible seaweed is dulse or dilisk, which grows on the rocky shores of the British Isles and also on the Pacific Coast. The fronds are rather flat and branching, dull reddish purple, meaty in texture; the flavor, while salty, is sweetish and spicy. On the west coast of Ireland it is eaten raw, just as one might nibble fruit or candy. Irish grocers in New York sell it, and after acquiring the taste one grows very fond of its seasoning.

The Rural New York gives the following recipe for cooking Irish moss:

Wash about one-half ounce, scant, of the moss very thoroughly, rinsing through several waters. Add one quart of milk in a double boiler and cook until the moss is soft. Strain but do not press or bruise the moss, or it will make the blanc mange dark. Sweeten to taste, add flavoring and set away in a mold. It makes a firm jelly, which we serve with cream instead of milk, but we prefer the milk. The moss boiled in water, strained, and the liquid used in lemonade, is very soothing as a drink in case of a cough or feverish cold.

CUP YACHT IS BEING MADE READY.

The work of fitting out the Resolute has begun. A new suit of sails has been ordered and will be ready before the yacht is in racing trim. This will make the eighth complete suit of sails the cup yacht has, and in addition she has many jibs, forestaysails and jib topsails. Some of these sails have never been used and others have been used only a few times.

Capt. Frank Miller is to be the professional on the Resolute. He has had considerable experience on large racing yachts and acted as mate on the Independence, the Constellation and on the schooner Ingomar when that yacht was sailed by Capt. Charles Barr. Miller is now at Bristol and soon will engage his crew and start to rig the Resolute. The yacht will be managed, as she was last year, by Robert W. Emmons 2d, and will be sailed by Charles Francis Adams.

At Bristol the riggers have taken some of the spars and rigging of the Resolute out of storage and attention already is being given to some of the many little things that collectively go to make a successful racing yacht. It is probable that she will be rigged with the bowsprit and double headsails she carried last season.

At City Island work soon will be started on the Vanitie and Capt. Christiansen will get together a fine racing crew and have the Cochran yacht in fine shape. It will be interesting to discover if she will be in better racing trim and able to make a better showing than she did last year. Capt. Christiansen has the reputation of being the best man to get a racing yacht in trim and to handle sails; and with everything working harmoniously on board the yacht, and with good racing wind and weather the contests between the Resolute and the Vanitie should be much more interesting than they were last year.

COMPARATIVE FIGURES

After remarking that the entire American business in coal tar colors amounts to only $10,000,000 a year, and that the world's production is only $100,000,000, Arthur D. Little gave to the United States Chamber of Commerce at its recent meeting in Washington some comparative figures as follows:

"The gross business of the Woolworth 5 and 10 cent stores in 1913 exceeded the entire export business of the whole German coal-tar color industry by $11,000,000. The sales of one mail-order house, Sears, Roebuck & Co., in the same year were far greater than the total output of all these German color plants, and its last special dividend is about twice the amount of their total dividend payment in 1913. The Eastman Kodak Company, with about twice the capital of the largest German color company, the Badische, and with a Government suit on its hands, earned during 1913 net profits of over $14,000,000, or 230 per cent. on its preferred stock and over 70 per cent. on its common, while the Badische with the benevolent and appreciative support of the German Government earned 45 per cent. In that year the entire German industry paid $11,000,000 in dividends. The Ford Motor Company with one standardized product does a greater annual business than all the German color plants with their 1,200 products and earns four times their combined dividend while paying three times their wages."

Mr. Little went on to speak of the waste of our own natural resources, which, he said, "offer opportunity for the ultimate development of a score of industries, each of a magnitude comparable to the color industry of Germany, and for the almost immediate upbuilding of hundreds of smaller enterprises relatively no less profitable. We waste, for instance, 150,000,000 tons of wood a year, a billion feet of natural gas a day, millions of tons of flax straw at every harvest, untouched peat deposits fringe our entire Atlantic seaboard, beehive coke ovens flame for miles in Pennsylvania, wasting precious ammonia and exciting no comment, while the burning of a $1,000 house would draw a mob. The whole South is a reservoir of industrial wealth untapped in any proper sense. We have heard these things so often that we can go to sleep while hearing them. We need to really sense them, to get before our consciousness a clear conception of what they actually mean in terms of wasted wealth and present opportunity. When we do this, and there is no better time than now, let us apply the lesson of the German coal-tar color industry to these far greater problems and solve them by the compelling agency of sustained, intensive research."

THE NINE WONDERS

— OR —

THE ROUGH RIDERS OF THE DIAMOND FIELDS

By GASTON GARNE

(A SERIAL STORY)

CHAPTER II (continued)

Bagley had often said to young Parton if he saw a chance to make good money on the quiet, outside of the business of the house, to promptly let him know, and that if the prospect was good he could put up a neat little sum as an investment.

A few days after Parton's visit to the little village of Homesdale the junior partner received a private letter in his mail from the young salesman. It was dated at Homesdale, and read as follows:

"My Dear Fred—At last I think I have stumbled upon a bonanza, which you have often charged me to be on the lookout for. This afternoon I was asked to umpire a game of baseball between two nines made up of boys between seventeen and nineteen years of age. It was played on the grounds of the village schoolhouse between the home team and a nine from Crow Hill, a little village eight miles below here. They were all sturdy young fellows, who had been brought up to wield the ax and crowbar, logging in these Adirondack Mountains. Of course there are no dudes among them, for they are rough and tough, strong as mules, but as jolly and good-natured as the average monkey. When I looked at them I found that I knew personally nearly all of them. You know I am ready to oblige anybody just for the fun of the thing, and am willing to umpire anything from a funeral down to a country dance. When I was asked to umpire the game I naturally thought of the peril that every umpire of a baseball game runs up against, and exacted a promise from every one individually not to kick against any decision I might make, stating at the same time if they did not so promise they must furnish me with an iron pot to fit over my head. They laughed and said there was no pot in the village big enough to fit me; so they promised not to kick, and I umpired the game.

"Now let me tell you, old man, that I have seen hundreds of games played by crack teams all the way between Chicago and New York, but never in my life did I see such a game played as the one I witnessed this afternoon. This Homesdale team here is made up of nine wonders; in fact, I consider them the Rough Riders of the Diamond Field. They seem to have muscles of steel, and their actions like greased lightning, while their pitcher is a marvel of science in curves, twists and spirals. He had not pitched more than two balls before I began to take particular notice of his work. I have seen curves made by famous pitchers, but this is the first time that I ever saw balls delivered that went through the air like aerial corkscrews.

"Then, again, he could make a ball wig-wag and zig-zag through the air like a leather-winged bat. It's a fact, old man; I'm giving it to you straight, just as I saw it. He made every batsman dizzy; several times he retired the Crow Hill team without a ball being hit. I am willing to bet my salary for the next twenty-five years that he can pitch out any team in the United States.

"Now, if we will take those fellows in hand and back them against any other nine between the two oceans, we can sweep the field, scoop the boodle, carry the pennant and boss the baseball world. Never in my life until this day have I regretted not banking my salary every month instead of investing in red paint and innocent hilarity.

"They are just what I say—nine wonders—and if you will put up the 'filthy lucre' to back these fellows and fail to win, I will sign an agreement to let you draw half my salary and black your shoes until you are reimbursed, provided always that I come in on the ground floor when the divvy is made of the profits. Yours till death,

"PARRY."

As soon as young Bagley read the characteristic letter of the traveling salesman he went out to the telegraph office and sent a dispatch to Parton in these words:

"Letter received. I'll back your judgment. Clinch the bonanza at once.
(Signed) FRED."

Parton was at Ellington when the dispatch reached him, and he waited another day in order that he might drive over to Homesdale in a buggy, it being Sunday when the firm would not expect him to attend to business. He reached the village at about ten o'clock in the forenoon, very much to the surprise of those who had assembled at the postoffice.

"Hello!" greeted one of the merchants. "What's up?"

"Nothing in the world," he replied, "except a natural desire to come over and see you folks. It is as good a place to spend Sunday as can be found anywhere in this region; the air is good, the men are square and honest, the women sweet and beautiful, and the cooking good enough for a king."

"Good for you, Parry!" laughed several of the men in the party. "We'll put up a headstone over you when you die, with the statement on it that 'here lies a man who never lied.'"

"Oh, please don't do that," laughed Parry, "because it would reflect upon the entire community."

"Why, how is that?" another asked.

"Why, just think how it would sound, 'here lies a man who never lied,' and I would be lying there all the time. That would make out that you fellows are the liars."

"Well, I'll be hanged!" ejaculated an old citizen, "there's more india rubber in the English language than any other in the world, for you can stretch it until the truth is a lie or a lie is the truth."

"That's so," laughed Parry, "but it is all the language we've got in this country, and you've got to get a dictionary before you can put a thing down straight in it. I once knew an Irishman who went into a cemetery to admire the tombstones and read the epitaphs. He was very much surprised to find on nearly all of them that everybody went to heaven who was buried there, and asked me where the bad ones were planted, as all the epitaphs he had read showed they were all good. 'Oh, well, Mike,' said I, 'when a man is dead, we have to let him down easy. If you will notice on most of the tombstones, you will see a little line which says "Peace to his ashes." 'Yes,' said he, 'I noticed that.' 'Well,' said I, 'they are the bad ones, because there are no ashes without fire.' 'Bedad,' says he, 'that's fine, and doesn't hurt the feelings of his friends. But,' said he, 'what's this?' and he pointed to another tombstone, and says, 'that puzzles me.' 'What puzzles you?' I asked. 'That,' says he, pointing to the line which read, 'Here lies a lawyer and an honest man.' 'What is it about that which puzzles you?' I asked. 'Why did they bury them both in the same grave?' he said. I had to explain it to him, and he made the same remark that you did about the india rubber in the English language."

During the laugh that followed the drummer's story Teddy Robinson and Tom Knatt, the captain and pitcher of the Homedale team, came along. Parton shook hands with both of them, after which he hitched his horse to a post in front of the postoffice, and whispered to both that he wanted to see them privately as soon as he could get away from the crowd.

"All right," said Teddy, "we'll wait for you down at the depot," and the two boys strolled off down the street, whilst Parton went to the village drug store in quest of a cigar.

Half an hour later he had joined them down by the railroad, and together they wandered away in the direction of a grove a few hundred yards beyond the little depot, where they sat down on a rude seat under the shade of a great spreading oak.

CHAPTER III.

THE CAMP GAINS—"WHERE DID THESE BOYS COME FROM?"

"Boys," said he, "I drove over here to-day from Ellington for no other purpose than to have a chat with you two."

"What's up?" Teddy asked.

"There is nothing up," was the reply, "but I want to put up something to back your mind against a crack team somewhere down the State."

"The dew you say!" exclaimed Teddy.

"Yes," he continued. "I've seen a great many games played by the crack teams all over the country, and you fellows can hold your own against any of them, and I am willing to back you for all I am worth."

"I don't see how we can, unless they come up here to play, for we can't leave our work, except on a Saturday afternoon, when we come in to stay over Sunday."

"Oh, I can arrange that," said Parton. "How much do you fellows earn a month?"

"About thirty dollars and found," was the reply.

"Well, now, see here. I'll agree to pay you fellows thirty dollars a week, your board and traveling expenses for three months if you will stop work, stop talking and play whenever or wherever I want you to."

"Do you mean thirty dollars a week for each one of us or for the whole nine?"

"For each one of you," said he.

"Geewillikens!" gasped young Knatt, the pitcher. "I'll do it, for one."

"Oh, we'll all do it," said Robinson. "but do you really mean it, Parton?"

"Of course I do, and I am ready to give each one of you ten dollars apiece to buy your uniforms and pay your way down to Utica on the day the game is to be played. I don't know exactly where it will be played, but I'm going to try to get it at that point. Do you think the rest of the nine will go into it?"

"I know they will," said Teddy.

"All right, then; you know I'm a man of business and am considered a good business man. I've the thirty dollars right here in my pocket to hand to you, but it must be on condition that you follow strictly my instructions."

"No trouble about that," said Teddy; "we'll do anything you say that is fair and square."

"Everything shall be square and fair, boys. The first thing to be done now is to get your uniforms, which I want to be a blue shirt and trousers, with a white belt and big white letters on the breast of the shirt."

"What are the letters?" Teddy asked.

"Two R's."

"What do they stand for?"

"Never mind about that; I'll tell you after the first game is played. Each of you must have a white cap, and be ready to leave on two days' notice, but you must not say anything about it to anybody outside of the team, not even to our home folks. Don't even mention my name, or that you are going to play with any other team, but you may say that I have made the nine a present of the uniform; people will think that is all right, and that I did it solely to advertise business. Now, what do you say?"

"It's all right," said Teddy.

"Very good; I will leave it all in your hands, and say nothing to the rest of the nine about it. It is to be for three months. I am going to make big money out of it, and when I do we'll have a big divvy after all expenses are taken out."

"That's all right," and the two boys grasped his hand, shaking it warmly in token of their acceptance of the bargain.

(To be continued)

TIMELY TOPICS

Nine-tenths of the gold mining of Russia is done on land belonging to the Crown. There are 84,000 workmen employed in the industry.

F. D. Acland, the financial secretary to the Treasury, speaking at a meeting in London, estimated the cost of the war to England at $150 a second. This means an expenditure of $12,960,000 a day. Lloyd George's recent estimate was $10,500,000.

Cotton flags will float over public buildings and from Coast Guard cutters and other vessels of the Treasury Department soon. Tests have just been completed by the department with flags made of American cotton instead of imported bunting, and these have showed that cotton flags are serviceable, durable and more economical than wool bunting.

Chester Hume, who has been in the county jail, Minneapolis, Minn., since Dec. 5, almost cried with joy recently when told by Jailor Nels Nelson he could leave the jail. He was back in his cell an hour later, smiling, for his hour of freedom was spent in a dentist's chair, where he had an aching tooth pulled. Hume was tried on a robbery charge two months ago and the jury disagreed. He is in jail awaiting retrial.

The ten submarines which the Fore River Shipbuilding Corporation is constructing at Quincy for the British Government will be launched shortly, within five months of the time the keels were laid. The trial trips will follow soon after, and the boats could be ready for commission by July 1, although they are not to be delivered until after the war. The average time for constructing submarines in this country previous has been more than two years.

The Councils' Liberty Bell Committee recently adopted the itinerary of the bell's trip to San Francisco, and have asked the officials of the Panama-Pacific Exposition to fix Saturday, July 17, as "Liberty Bell Day." Following a celebration and parade here the bell will leave Philadelphia on Monday afternoon, July 5. During the twelve-day trip to the coast, it will be illuminated at night so that it may be seen in every town through which it passes in the dark hours.

A large old turkey buzzard that has been in the possession of Justice John W. Probst, of Lawrenceburg, Ind., for several years disappeared from his poultry yard last fall. Justice Probst supposed it had died. The buzzard had worn a small bell attached to its neck for many months. The other Sunday the justice was startled by hearing a bell ringing in the top of a tree in front of his residence. He called the buzzard's name several times and was surprised to see the old bird suddenly fly down and alight on his front porch.

Placing a wedge under a door is one of the most effectual means of closing it, for pushing upon the door from the outside only increases the effect of the wedge. A convenient device of this kind is made of metal, says the Scientific American, and it not only serves to wedge the door, but also contains a mechanical bell mounted on the same base and behind the wedge in such a way that pressure on the face of the wedge causes the bell to ring. The base carries a set of short points underneath, so that it can be put in place and grips upon the carpet or flooring so as not to slide out of position. Such a device can be carried in the pocket, and it is to be recommended for traveling.

While two little bear cubs were in the buggy crying for their mother, who was tearing up the road in a frantic effort to reach them, Martin Brosims was with whip and voice urging his team of horses to speed to Hibbing, Minn., following an encounter with the cubs and their mother near the C. L. C. springs. Brosims, who has purchased a farm near Bear River with the intention of beginning extensive farming there, was on his way to the farm. "Slim" Austin, of Hibbing, was with him. The men saw the two cubs in the road. The mother bear was not in sight, so they picked up the cubs. Three rods further on they spied the mother bear sitting on her haunches in the middle of the highway. As soon as bruin heard the cries of her progeny she advanced on the team, which was turned toward Hibbing at a gallop. The cubs are now on exhibition at "Slim" Austin's place of business.

That the long arm of the German spy system reached into the plant of the Thomas B. Jeffrey Company at Kenosha, Wis., and through one of its agents, supposedly an employee of the auto truck manufacturing concern, placed enough emery dust in the cylinders of $350,000 worth of auto trucks under construction for Great Britain and her allies to insure the rejection of the trucks by the inspector of the foreign governments at New York, is the story rapidly gaining circulation in Wisconsin. It was to get Great Britain to recede from its original rejection of the order that Thomas B. Jeffrey, head of the company, was aboard the Lusitania en route to Liverpool. Mr. Jeffrey was one of the passengers who was rescued when the liner was torpedoed. Executive officials of the company, it is understood, have guarded the facts in the case, but at a dinner recently tendered ex-President Taft in Milwaukee an official high in the Jeffrey organization is alleged to have admitted the reasons for Mr. Jeffrey's presence aboard the Lusitania. The trucks, had they been inspected and turned over for work upon the fields of France, would have been racked to pieces in a few weeks and would have been rendered worthless, it is alleged. Any attempt to prove the identity of the person or persons responsible for the alleged acts would be practically useless, the Jeffrey people employing hundreds of workmen of German nationality or descent.

Fame and Fortune Weekly

NEW YORK, JUNE 18, 1915.

TERMS TO SUBSCRIBERS

Single Copies.....	.05 Cents
One Copy Three Months.....	.65 Cents
One Copy Six Months.....	1.25
One Copy One Year.....	2.50

Postage Free

HOW TO SEND MONEY—At our risk send P. O. Money Order, Check or Registered Letter; remittances in any other way are at your risk. We accept Postage Stamps the same as cash. When sending silver wrap the Coin in a separate piece of paper to avoid cutting the envelope. Write your name and address plainly. Address letters to

HARRY E. WOLFF, President
ROY L. McARDLE, Vice-President
N. HAWTHORN WOLFF, Treasurer
CHARLES E. NYLANDER, Secretary

Frank Tousey, Publisher
168 West 23d St., N. Y.

GOOD CURRENT NEWS ARTICLES

The University of Pennsylvania Amazon expedition has made another journey into the unknown, and is now exploring the frontier regions of Brazil, Peru and Bolivia. The expedition expects to spend six months in that region and to return to civilization at Para.

Several new mortars recently mounted at Fort Andrew, Boston, and capable of hurling projectiles weighing half a ton eight and a half miles, were tested. They are said to be the most powerful weapons on the coast. The projectiles are not explosive, being designed to sink a vessel by tearing a hole through her by the force of their fall from a great height.

C. R. Kolb, president of a local manufacturing concern, Battle Creek, Mich., has refused an order from a European Government for shrapnel shells. The order, if accepted, would have amounted to about $3,000 a day for an indefinite period. "I could not sleep easy with the thought that the product of our plant was murdering boys in Europe," said Mr. Kolb. "If the United States wanted the shrapnel we would make them."

In the course of the present European war it has been noticed that parrots work themselves into a state of intense excitement and screech loudly on the approach of an aeroplane, even before the latter is visible to human eyes. A number of these birds were placed on the Eiffel Tower and other suitable points of observation in order to test their utility as sentinels. Unfortunately, however, they are unable to distinguish between friendly and hostile aircraft.

A life-saving parachute has been patented in which a device that may be worn as a garment has a flexible overhanging and relatively wide skirt band secured to the body portion at a point near its upper end and beneath the arms of the wearer and flexible stays are secured to the lower end of the body portion and to the outer edge of the overhanging band so that as the wearer descends his downwardly extending legs will operate upon the stays to hold the band at its outer edges so the latter will expand and operate as a parachute.

The naval correspondent of the London Times gives an account of a previously unreported naval action. The report from Buenos Ayres, he says, that the German auxiliary cruiser Navarra was sunk in the Pacific off the coast of Chile on Feb. 11 is incorrect. This vessel came to her end in the South Atlantic, off the coast of Brazil, three months earlier, being sunk by the British converted cruiser Orama. The latter met the converted German cruiser Navarra off the coast of Brazil. In the engagement which ensued the speed of the Orama and the marksmanship of her gunners quickly told in her favor. In a very brief time the German vessel was on fire and her guns silenced. Nor does it appear that the British vessel suffered any injury. The crew of the Navarra got away in their boats, and were taken on board the victor, and the German vessel soon afterward went down.

GRINS AND CHUCKLES

"Why do you carry that umbrella, little boy?" asked the passerby curiously. "It's not raining and the sun is not shining." "I know," said the youth, "but when it rains pa wants it and when the sun shines ma wants it, and this is the only kind of weather I can git ter use it at all."

Master—Can a leopard change his spots? Freddie—Yes, sir. Master—Now, that's quite wrong. You know that a leopard cannot change his spots. Freddie—Oh, but he can, sir, readily. Master—Well, tell me how, then. Freddie—When he's tired of sitting on one spot he can change to another.

"There's a strange man at the door, sir," announced the new servant from Boston. "What does he want?" asked the master of the house impatiently. "Begging your pardon, sir," replied the servant, a shade of disapproval manifest in his voice, "he wants a bath, but what he is asking for is something to eat."

"Oh," sighed little Rastus, rolling his eyes soulfully, "I jes' wish I was a Junebug!" "Why foh you wish dat, chile?" asked his fond mamma. "'Cause den I fly straight to heaven!" "Huh!" scornfully and discouragingly rejoined mamma. "you fool nigger, doan' you know dat a woodpecker ketch you-all 'fore you get halfway dar?"

An old farmer in Ayrshire had a habit of feigning deafness when he wanted to avoid answering an awkward question. One day a neighbor said to him: "I'd like to borrow your cart this morning. Mine is having a spring mended." "You'll have to speak louder," the old farmer answered. "I don't hear very well—and I don't like to lend my cart, anyhow."

An old negro in Carrollton, Mo., being ill, was attended by a colored physician; but as the patient did not improve, a white medico was called in. Doctor S— felt the darky's pulse for a moment, and then examined his tongue. "Did your other doctor take your temperature?" he asked. "I don't know, sah," he answered feebly. "I ain't missed anything but my watch as yit, boss."

THE MANIAC'S VICTIM.

By Kit Clyde

Madness is a terrible thing.

For those outside of the medical profession and the families into which the dread disease has made its way, who can understand, can conceive, even the slightest part of the dreadful truth.

But what makes the fact of insanity more horrible is that in most cases the fault lies with the victim himself.

When putting to your lips the first glass of liquor, young man, remember that the abuse of this stuff has made more maniacs than all the other causes combined.

The cursed stuff does its work so insidiously that at last a man goes to sleep at night perfectly sane, and wakes up in the morning a madman.

It may take years to lay up to the fatal point, but the rest comes with a rush.

In all the years of my experience with insanity (the author is quoting a MS. of his uncle, it will be remembered), I have met with no case more harrowing than that of Harold Goasbeck, whom I this day saw laid away in the grave.

Harold Goasbeck was the only child of wealthy parents. They were descendants of one of the old Dutch families who originally settled in the city of New York, and proud they were, too, of their family, of their descent from the Knickerbockers.

Until the age of twenty, three Harold Goasbeck had been a modest, young man, honest, thoroughly straightforward, and temperate even to abstinence. Then he began to take a drink now and then.

His parents were not alarmed by this, for it was no more than thousands of young men did, without any harm befalling them. But they were alarmed when one night he came home under the influence of liquor.

They talked to him kindly, yet reproachfully.

He acknowledged his fault, and promised not to take liquor again. Not did he so long as they lived.

But they paid the debt of estate a few months later. Mr. Goasbeck died first, and his faithful wife was laid beside him in less than a month.

Left immensely rich by his father's death, Harold became a thing for young men who had already spent their fortunes to prey upon.

For a long time he resisted their temptings, strengthened in his resolutions by the dear face his memory ever carried, that of Nelly Sargent.

They had both been devoted to each other, and were engaged to be married. One thing which she had an especial horror of was liquor. And Harold had kept the knowledge of his single escapade religiously from her.

Fatal was the day when he again put the glass to his lips.

The two ladies, there was little difficulty in persuading him to drink again.

These friends, who cautioned and enjoined him, had been once, and injured his memory with him.

There are hundreds of just such cases in this great city—men who have spent their all, and now hang around and help to pluck any "pigeon" who falls into their hands. They would recoil at thoughts of anything dishonest; are not actually wicked, yet enact a part on the stage of life which brings in its track nothing but ruin and desolation.

It was among such men that Harold Goasbeck had fallen.

Could they have seen the future, could they have guessed the end, they would have dashed the poisonous cup from his lips. But the end was veiled from their sight, and they led him on drinking at his expense, borrowing his money, involving him in moral as well as financial ruin.

Two nights in each week, nothing they could say or do could tempt him to join them. Those were the nights of Wednesday and Sunday, which he invariably spent with Nelly Sargent.

Poor girl!

She was perfectly ignorant of the evil days that had come.

She saw that his hand sometimes trembled, that his eyes were heavy, but she never guessed what blight it was which was slowly descending upon Harold's life—upon her own life.

Her twin sister Madge, with her perception undiminished by love, keenly guessed the truth, but would not whisper a word to Nelly, for that word would break her heart.

Instead, she sought and found an opportunity to speak to Harold, and warned him what the end must be if Nelly learned the truth—and Harold, frightened, swore he would stop.

But it was already too late in the day. The demon drink had already obtained too great a hold.

Still he always managed to be perfectly straight when he called on Nelly, and his appearance there was always punctual to the minute.

And Nelly, happy, trusting, never awakened to the truth until it was thrust upon her in all its hideous reality.

Just as the clock struck eight on Wednesday evening, the door bell rang. Her heart pulsated a little faster, but she lighted with a smile—a smile that became frozen as she saw Harold step within the parlor door.

Forgetful of the day, he had drank heavily. Suddenly remembering that it was Wednesday, remembrance of his actual condition, he had returned to her house.

One long and sorrowful look Nelly fastened upon him, and then burst into tears. He tried to console her, would have touched her, but she shrank away.

"Oh! Harold—Harold!"

It was all she could say.

Deeply moved by her sorrow, he asked for forgiveness and swore never to drink again.

Vain oath!

Hoping for the best—yet fearing—Nelly forgave him, but sent him away; she could not bear to see him so.

The turning point in Harold's life had arrived. He knew it, and strove hard to do what was right.

But none could be refused when the boys asked him to drink? They were a jovial, whole-hearted set, and would ridicule him.

Ridicule! It is the hardest thing in the world for most men to stand.

Harold's good resolutions did not hold out twenty-four hours, though it was months before Nelly could be positively sure he had been drinking before coming to see her.

The day originally set for the wedding came and passed. Nelly said: "Wait!" She dared not trust her future life in his hands now, even though she loved him so deeply.

Fate so shaped matters that she one day saw him in the street, too drunk to stand alone, supported between two companions.

When he came again, she went to the parlor to meet him, with a face, oh! so sad and pale, but firmly set and resolute.

She gave him her hand, but would not permit him to kiss her.

And as he held her hand, he noticed that the engagement ring he had placed on her finger so long ago was missing. And a vague and terrible fear filled his heart.

She saw that he had noticed that the ring no longer occupied its accustomed place, and, disengaging her hand, she took the ring from her pocket, and without a word placed it in his hand.

"What is this?" he demanded.

"Your own conscience must tell you why I return this pledge, a pledge received goodness knows with what pleasure. Good-by, Harold!"

She glided to the door, paused, seemed about to speak again, then silently faded from sight.

Stunned, scarcely able to comprehend, clutching the ring in his hand, Harold left the house.

"She gives me up merely because I take a glass now and then," he bitterly said, as he sat in his room the next morning. "But she loves me still—ha-ha! and I'll break her heart as she has broken mine. I'll drink—ay, drink myself into the grave, and on my deathbed I'll let her know she drove me to it. I wonder will she drop a tear? Ay, gallons of them!" and he laughed, gleefully.

Already had the demon begun to steal his reason. Yes, Harold Goasbeck even then trembled on the verge of insanity.

From that hour he drank—as the saying goes—"like a fish," although we fail to see the aptitude of the simile. And every glass of liquor he poured down his throat was partially done with the insane desire to avenge himself on the girl who even then was growing wan and pale with grief on his account.

A year passed away.

He was given now to the wildest extravagances, the deepest debauches.

His face had grown haggard, his eyes were bloodshot, his hands trembled, there was a nervous uneasiness in all he did. A competent man would have said: "His nerves are all unstrung; the man is more a madman than a sane one."

"Fill 'em up, boys!" he cried to half a dozen boon companions gathered about a table in a private part of a sample room, so called. "Fill 'em up, boys! Ha-ha! A short life but a merry one!"

Finishing, he sprang upon the table and began a mad dance.

His companions shuddered as they gazed at him. His looks were so wild, his manner so strange. There was something wrong with him.

Ah, there was!

Suddenly catching up the bottles he began to hurl them fiercely about the room; breaking the globes, and then springing from the table he smashed the chairs and everything in the room that was breakable. The spirit of destruction was upon him, and he rended everything of which his strength was capable.

Meanwhile his companions tried to calm him. But in vain. Turning at last, he sprang at the throat of one, and would have choked him to death but for having been dragged off; and then they all rushed from the room, leaving the maniac alone.

A policeman was called, but before he came the madman had made his escape from the place.

His eyes were lurid; he champed his teeth, and rushed along the street with a definite and dreadful purpose gleaming in every expression.

He arrived before the house in which Nelly Sargent lived.

A servant was just issuing through the basement door, and as it opened he dashed in. He knew where Nelly's room was situated, and straight to it he rushed, waving a revolver in his hand.

He found the poor girl on her knees beside the bed. Tears were flowing from her eyes as she prayed for him.

He only knew that it was her. His crazed brain was filled with the idea that she had wronged him—not that he had broken her heart—he had come for revenge, and quickly cocking the revolver he sent a bullet into her brain just as she turned her pale, wan, tear-stained face toward him.

Without as much as a groan she sank to the floor.

With a startled look on his face he bent above her.

"That's not Nelly!" he cried. "She was plump and rosy and beautiful."

The change had indeed been great. No wonder he did not recognize that thin, pale face, with its expression of suffering and bitter sorrow.

He rushed from the room, dashing hither and thither, as a bloodhound seeks for a scent. Upstairs—downstairs—and into the sitting-room, where he came face to face with Nelly's twin sister Madge.

Snap! The pistol failed to go off, and hurling it from him with a cry of disgust, he sprang at Madge, and twining his fingers about her throat commenced to choke her, while he filled the house with his awful yells.

The madman's fury must have robbed her of her life, had not a man's figure bounded across the threshold.

An instant, and then the newcomer sprang forward, seized the maniac by the collar and dragged him back, clenched his fist and dealt him a fearful blow on the temple which stretched him senseless on the floor.

Harold Goasbeck was placed under my care not many hours later, raving mad. I ordered his bonds taken off and had him placed in a padded room.

"Better he should die than live in such a mental condition," I concluded, and he was kept without liquor.

Dancing, singing, shouting, he was never quiet for a single minute during a whole week, and then exhaustion caused his death.

A Genuine Rupture Cure Sent on Trial to Prove It

Don't Wear a Truss Any Longer

After Thirty Years' Experience I Have Produced An Appliance for Men, Women and Children That Actually Cures Rupture.

If you have tried most everything else, come to me. Where others fail is where I have my greatest success. Send attached coupon to-day and I will send you free my illustrated book on Rupture and its cure, showing my Appliance and giving you prices and names of many people who have tried it and were cured. It is instant relief when all others fail. Remember, I use no salves, no harness, no lies.

I send on trial to prove what I say is true. You are the judge and once having seen my illustrated book and read it you will be as enthusiastic as my hundreds of patients whose letters you can also read. Fill out free coupon below and mail to-day. It's well worth your time whether you try my Appliance or not.

Pennsylvania Man Thankful

Mr. C. E. Brooks, Marshall, Mich.

Dear Sir:—Perhaps it will interest you to know that I have been ruptured six years and have always had trouble with it till I got your Appliance. It is very easy to wear, fits neat and snug, and is not in the way at any time, day or night. In fact, at times I did not know I had it on; it just adapted itself to the shape of the body and seemed to be a part of the body, as it clung to the spot, no matter what position I was in.

It would be a veritable God-send to the unfortunates who suffer from rupture if all could procure the Brooks Rupture Appliance and wear it. They would certainly never regret it.

My rupture is now all healed up and nothing ever did it but your Appliance. Whenever the opportunity presents itself I will say a good word for your Appliance, and also the honorable way in which you deal with ruptured people. It is a pleasure to recommend a good thing among your friends or strangers. I am,

Yours very sincerely,

JAMES A. BRITTON.

80 Spring St., Bethlehem, Pa.

Confederate Veteran Cured

Commerce, Ga., R. F. D. No. 11.

Mr. C. E. Brooks,

Dear Sir:—I am glad to tell you that I am now sound and well and can plough or do any heavy work. I can say your Appliance has effected a permanent cure. Before getting your Appliance I was in a terrible condition and had given up all hope of ever being any better. If it hadn't been for your Appliance I would never have been cured. I am sixty-eight years old and served three years in Eckle's Artillery, Oglethorpe Co. I hope God will reward you for the good you are doing for suffering humanity.

Yours sincerely,

H. D. BANKS.

Others Failed but the Appliance Cured

C. E. Brooks, Marshall, Mich.,

Dear Sir:—Your Appliance did all you claim for the little boy and more, for it cured him sound and well. We let him wear it for about a year in all, although it cured him 3 months after he had begun to wear it. We had tried several other remedies and got no relief, and I shall certainly recommend it to friends, for we surely owe it to you. Yours respectfully,

The above is C. E. Brooks, inventor of the Appliance, who cured himself and who has been curing others for over 30 years. If ruptured, write him today at Marshall, Mich.

WM. PATTERSON.

No. 717 S. Main St., Akron, O.

Cured at the Age of 76

Mr. C. E. Brooks, Marshall, Mich.,

Dear Sir:—I began using your Appliance for the cure of rupture (I had a pretty bad case) I think in May, 1905. On November 20, 1905, I quit using it. Since that time I have not needed or used it. I am well of rupture and rank myself among those cured by the Brooks Discovery, which, considering my age, 76 years, I regard as remarkable.

Very sincerely yours,

Jamestown, N. C. SAM A. HOOVER.

Child Cured in Four Months

21 Jansen St., Dubuque, Iowa.

Brooks Rupture Appliance Co.,

Gentlemen:—The baby's rupture is altogether cured, thanks to your Appliance, and we are so thankful to you. If we could only have known of it sooner our little boy would not have had to suffer near as much as he did. He wore your brace a little over four months and has not worn it now for six weeks.

Yours very truly,

ANDREW EGGENBERGER.

Ten Reasons Why

You Should Send for Brooks Rupture Appliance

1. It is absolutely the only Appliance of the kind on the market to-day, and in it are embodied the principles that inventors have sought after for years.

2. The Appliance for retaining the rupture cannot be thrown out of position.

3. Being an air cushion of soft rubber it clings closely to the body, yet never blisters or causes irritation.

4. Unlike the ordinary so-called pads, used in other trusses, it is not cumbersome or ungainly.

5. It is small, soft and pliable, and positively cannot be detected through the clothing.

6. The soft, pliable bands holding the Appliance do not give one the unpleasant sensation of wearing a harness.

7. There is nothing about it to get foul, and when it becomes soiled it can be washed without injuring it in the least.

8. There are no metal springs in the Appliance to torture one by cutting and bruising the flesh.

9. All of the material of which the Appliances are made is of the very best that money can buy, making it a durable and safe Appliance to wear.

10. My reputation for honesty and fair dealing is so thoroughly established by an experience of over thirty years of dealing with the public, and my prices are so reasonable, my terms so fair, that there certainly should be no hesitancy in sending free coupon to-day.

Remember

I send my Appliance on trial to prove what I say is true. You are to be the judge. Fill out free coupon below and mail to-day.

Free Information Coupon

C. E. Brooks, 1942 State Street, Marshall, Mich.

Please send me by mail in plain wrapper your illustrated book and full information about your Appliance for the cure of rupture.

Name.....

City.....

R. F. D.....State.....

INTERESTING ARTICLES

FRANCE'S FOREIGN TRADE DECREASING.

France's foreign trade has decreased almost 50 per cent. since the war began, according to statistics received by cable from the American Consul General at Paris. During the first four months of 1915 the total foreign commerce amounted to $597,346,773 against $1,009,890,835 for the same months last year. Imports were $420,665,116 against $583,363,923 and exports were $176,681,657 against $426,526,921.

EATS ABOUT HALF A MILLION LOAVES A DAY.

It has been estimated that New York eats about half a million loaves of bread a day. To turn out this tremendous supply all sorts of machinery are employed. Even the smallest baker has long been equipped with his patent dough mixer, but the big concerns with their sanitary plants and improved methods have carried the machine into realms where it was not believed possible to enter. The industry has been revolutionized until a product has been turned out which is never touched by the human hand until the consumer tears off the sealed covering.

Many ingenious appliances are employed to attain this end, and a visit to the model factories reveals all that has been accomplished along these lines. The dingy kitchens of the old days have been abandoned for the bright, clean, airy workrooms flooded with sunshine. Every precaution is taken to guard against contamination, the employees being garbed and gloved in white. As a result of these measures, the consumer is assured of a product which is as safe, if not safer, to eat than something from his own kitchen.

The enterprise of the big bakers has enabled them to extend their operations into many fields and has practically eliminated the domestic baking of bread. The large concerns have not only undertaken to supply the local market but send their emissaries far and wide through the neighboring country. With excellent train service and automobile trucks deliveries can be made with a promptness that guarantees a strictly fresh product each day. Consequently one of the most laborious processes of the home kitchen is done away with.

CALIFORNIA'S BIG WATER POWER.

By far the greatest hydro-electric development in America is that now well under way to completion on the Big Creek that flows into the San Joaquin River, about 70 miles east of Fresno, Cal. This short stream falls 1400 feet in six miles and drains a basin of about 88 square miles over which there is an average annual rainfall of more than 80 inches. The Pacific Light and Power Corporation is turning this tremendous waterfall into electricity and transmitting it to Los Angeles, 240 miles away. The Scientific American describes how this river has been dammed to make a reservoir with a capacity of 53,000 acre feet, which is now being increased to 120,000 acre feet by raising the dams. There are two power-houses, one halfway down and the other at the foot of the fall. The water runs through a tunnel and steel pipes to the first power-house, where it rushes from 6-inch nozzles with a velocity of 350 feet per second, or about 240 miles an hour. It strikes the buckets of wheels 94 inches in diameter, making these spin as fast as the drivers of a locomotive traveling 100 miles an hour. Each pair of these wheels develops 23,500 horsepower. Then the water falls through more tunnels and pipes to the lower power-house, where it sets more wheels spinning. In each power-house there are two main generators, each of 17,500 kilowatts capacity. Here the current is generated at 6,000 volts and raised by transformers to 150,000 volts. It is carried by six aluminum cables, each an inch in diameter, across the 240 miles of desert and mountains to Los Angeles. The Scientific American says that when the plant's full power shall have been realized "it will form an inexhaustible mine of energy, with an output that could not be equaled by the consumption of over 8,000,000 tons of coal per year in a very efficient plant."

HOW ANIMALS FIGHT.

Animals of different species do not often fight one another, because they cannot comprehend or guard against an attack different from that used by one of their own kind, says a contributor to Youth's Companion. The predatory beasts in many cases overcome their prey, not because they are very much stronger, but because of the fear and confusion that their strange method of attack causes in their quarry.

For example, a dog of a fighting breed charges like a lion, and nearly every member of the deer tribe, including even the elk and the moose, flies from him in panic; but when one of these animals learns the real power of a dog, it is a different matter.

Hobart Ames kept a number of deer in a park at his winter home in Tennessee, among them a buck with a fine set of horns. The buck came to have a great contempt and dislike for dogs, and any unfortunate dog that got into the deer inclosure did well to escape with his life. The buck had learned that no dog could withstand his charge or the thrust of his horns, and running from them was the last thing he thought of. On the other hand, the dogs were greatly puzzled by an animal that fought by all rules to run away, but did not.

One night the big buck jumped out of his yard, and Mr. Ames' foreman put the dogs on the deer's track. They found him in a thicket a quarter of a mile from the house. There was a fight, and then the dogs were seen coming home at top speed, followed by the enraged buck. His hair was turned the wrong way, and his eyes burned redly as he charged every dog he could overtake. Several of the hounds were badly hurt, and all of them were scared. They fled to their own quarters, and it required the combined efforts of the kennel men and stable boys to rescue the pack. Probably if a single one of those hounds had learned to fight a deer at any time, the buck would have been followed by his mates.

CRAWLING BUGS

These giant beetles are beautifully enameled in natural, brilliant colors. There is a roller underneath, actuated by hidden springs. When the roller is wound up the bug crawls about in the most lifelike manner. Try one on the maid if you want to enjoy yourself. Price, 12c. each, by mail, postpaid.

C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

THE FINGER THROUGH THE HAT.

Having borrowed a hat from your friend, push your finger through the crown of it, and it is seen to move about. Though very amusing to others, the owner of the hat does not see the joke, but thinks it means to destroy his hat; yet when it is returned it is perfectly uninjured. Price, 10c. each by mail.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

WINDOW SMASHERS.

The greatest sensation, just from Paris. A most wonderful effect of a smashing, breaking, falling pane or glass. It will electrify everybody. When you come home, slam the door shut and at the same time throw the discs to the floor. Every pane of glass in the house will at once seem to have been shattered. Price, by mail, postpaid, 35c., a set of six plates.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

KNITTER

Every boy who wants a whip-lash, pair of reins, or any other knitted article of similar kind should have a Knitter. Anybody can work it. The most beautiful designs can be made by using colored worsteds with this handy little object. It is handsomely lacquered, strongly made, and the wires are very durable.

Price, 10c. each, by mail, postpaid. C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

FOUR WEEKS (A LOUD BOOK).

Has the absolute and exact shape of a book in cloth. Upon the opening of the book, after having it set up according to directions furnished, a loud report similar to that of a pistol-shot will be heard, much to the amazement and surprise of the victim. Caps not mailable; can be bought at any toy store. Price, 65c. by mail, postpaid.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

TRICK CARD CASE

A simple looking case like those containing an ordinary pack of playing cards. But the top card is only a dummy. Hidden inside the seeming pack is an ingenious mechanism; when you pull out the pack a trigger is released and explodes a cap with a loud report. Perfectly harmless and yet a source of no end of fun.

Price, 25c. each, by mail, postpaid. FRANK SMITH, 383 Lenox Ave., N. Y.

THE PRINCESS OF YOGI CARD TRICK.

Four cards are held in the form of a fan and a spectator is requested to mentally select one of the four. The cards are now shuffled and one is openly taken away and placed in his pocket. The performer remarks that he has taken the card mentally selected by the spectator. The three cards are now displayed and the selected card is found to be missing. Reaching in his pocket the performer removes and exhibits the chosen card. Price, 15c.

FRANK SMITH, 383 Lenox Ave., N. Y.

SURPRISE MOVING-PICTURE MACHINE.

It consists of a small nickel metal tube, 4 1/2 inches long, with a lens eye-view, which shows a pretty ballet girl or any other scene. Hand it to a friend who will be delighted with the first picture, tell him to turn the screw on the side of the instrument, to change the views, when a stream of water squirts in his face, much to his surprise. The instrument can be refilled with water in an instant, and one filling will suffice for four or five victims.

Price, 30c. each by mail, postpaid; 4 for $1.00. C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

BASEBALL PUZZLE

Here is a tough one. It looks like a watch. Inside the glass is a diagram of a baseball field. At each base there is a small depression. Rolling around are a number of tiny bird-shot. The trick is to get a single shot in each of the depressions on the bases. It can be done, if you know how; but if you don't, the task seems impossible. Price, 12c. each, by mail, postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

SNAP BACK MATCH SAFE.

Just out! A trick match safe. It is a beautifully nickelled box, of the size to hold matches. But when your friend presses the spring to take out a match, the lid flies back, and pinches his finger just hard enough to startle without hurting him. This is a dandy!

Price, 15c. each by mail, postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

THE FRIGHTFUL RATTLESNAKE!

To all appearance it is a harmless piece of coiled paper with a mouth-piece attachment, but upon placing it to one's mouth, and blowing into the tube, an imitation snake over two feet in length springs out of the roll like a flash of lightning, producing a whistling, fluttering sound that would frighten a wild Indian. We guarantee our rattlesnake not to bite, but would not advise you to play the joke on timid women or delicate children. Each snake packed in a box. Price, 10c.; 3 for 25c., mailed postpaid.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

MUSICAL SEAT

The best joke out. You can have more fun than a circus, with one of these novelties. All you have to do is to place one on a chair seat (hidden under a cushion, if possible). Then tell your friend to sit down. An unearthly shriek from the little round drum will send your victim up in the air, the most puzzled and astonished mortal on earth. Don't miss getting one of these genuine laugh producers. Perfectly harmless, and never misses doing its work.

Price 20 cents each, by mail, post-paid. WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

THE DISAPPEARING CIGAR.

A new and startling trick. You ask a friend if he will have a cigar; if he says yes (which is usually the case), you take from your pocket or cigar case, an ordinary cigar, and hand it to him. As he reaches out for it, the cigar instantly disappears right before his eyes, much to his astonishment. You can apologize, saying, you are very sorry, but that it was the last cigar you had, and the chances are that he will invite you to smoke with him if you will let him into the secret. It is not done by sleight-of-hand, but the cigar actually disappears so suddenly that it is impossible for the eye to follow it, and where it has gone, no one can tell. A wonderful illusion. Price, 10c.; 3 for 25c. by mail, postpaid.

C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

COMICAL RUBBER STAMPS.

A complete set of five grotesque little people made of indestructible rubber mounted on black walnut blocks. The figures consist of Policeman, Chinaman, and other laughable figures as shown in pictures. As each figure is mounted on a separate block, any boy can set up a regular parade or circus by printing the figures in different positions. With each set of figures we send a bottle, of colored ink, an ink pad and full instructions. Children can stamp these pictures on their toys, picture books, writing paper and envelopes, and they are without doubt the most amusing and entertaining novelty gotten up in years. Price of the complete set of Rubber Stamps, with ink and ink pad, only 10c.; 3 sets for 25c., one dozen 80c., by mail postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

$30 A Week TO BOYS

YOUR best chance to clean up some money. Crescent Orangeade comes in powder form. You make the drink yourself. Our catalog, mailed FREE, tells how. Costs one-half cent a glass. Retail at 5c. Sells at ball games, picnics, circuses, dances, from house to house and to restaurants. Boys make $5 to $10 a day. Send 10c for trial package, postpaid, enough for seven-teen glasses, 85c in sales. Write today for FREE catalog and full information how to make $30 weekly.

Crescent Powder

CHAS. MORRISSEY CO. 414 Madison Street, Dept. 4417 Chicago, Ill.

SEUR ORANGEADE

Asthma & HAY FEVER REMEDY sent by express to you on Free Trial. If it cures send $1; if not, don't. Give express office. Write today. Address W. E. STERLINE, 837 Poplar St. Sidney, Ohio

TOBACCO HABIT You can conquer it easily in 8 days. Improve your health, prolong your life. No more stomach trouble, no foul breath, no heart weakness. Regain manly vigor, calm nerves, clear eyes and superior mental strength. Whether you chew or smoke pipe, cigarettes, cigars, get my interesting Tobacco Book. Worth its weight in gold. Mailed free. E. J. WOODS. H 228 Station E, New York, N. Y.

GREENBACKS

Pack of $1,000 Stage Bills, 10c; 3 packs, 25c. Send for a pack and show the boys what a WAD you carry. C. A. NICHOLS, JR., Box 90, Chili, N. Y.

THE PEG JUMPER.

A very effective pocket trick, easily to be performed by any one. A miniature paddle is shown. Central holes are drilled through it. A wooden peg is inside of the upper hole. Showing now both sides of the paddle, the performer causes, by simply breathing upon it, the peg to leave the upper hole, and appear in the middle one. Then it jumps to the lower hole, back to the middle one, and lastly to the upper hole. Both sides of the paddle are repeatedly shown. Price by mail, 15c.

C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

NORWEGIAN MOUSE.

A very large gray mouse, measuring 8 inches from tip of nose to end of tail. The body of mouse is hollow. Place your first finger in his body, and then by moving your finger up and down, the mouse appears to be running up your sleeve. Enter a room where there are ladies, with the mouse running up your sleeve, and you will see a rapid scattering of the fair sex. Many practical jokes can be perpetrated with this small rodent.

Price, 10c.; 3 for 25c. mailed, postpaid. FRANK SMITH, 383 Lenox Ave., N. Y.

WHISTLEPHONE

This is one of the greatest musical instruments ever invented. It is made entirely of metal and is almost invisible when in use. With it, in a few moments, you can learn to play all kinds of tunes, have lots of fun, please and amuse your friends and make some money, too. Fine for either song or piano accompaniment or by itself alone. You place the whistlephone in the mouth with half circle out, place end of tongue to rounded part and blow gently as if to cool the lips. A few trials will enable one to play any tune or air.

Price 6 cents each by mail, post-paid. H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

KANGAROO PADLOCK.

A handsome padlock stamped out of polished steel. It locks itself when the hasp is pressed down into the lock, but the puzzle is to unlock it. You can instantly unlock it with the key, but no one not in the secret can unlock it. You can slip the hasp through a friend's buttonhole and force him to wear it until you release it, although he may have the key to the lock; or a boy and girl can be locked together by slipping the hasp through a buttonhole of their clothing. Many other innocent and amusing jokes can be perpetrated with it upon your friends and acquaintances. It is not only a strong, useful padlock, but one of the best puzzles ever invented. Full printed instructions sent with each lock. They are a bonanza for agents, as they can be readily sold for 25 cents each. Our price, 15c.; 2 for 25c.; one dozen, $1.20, sent by mail, postpaid.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

THE BURNING CIGARETTE.

The greatest trick joke out. A perfect imitation of a smouldering cigarette with bright red fire. It fools the wisest. Send 10c. and we will mail it. WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

DELUSION TRICK.

A magic little box in three parts that is very mystifying to those not in the trick. A coin placed on a piece of paper disappears by dropping a nickel ring around it from the magic box. Made of hard wood two inches in diameter. Price, 12c. H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

VANISHING AND RE-APPEARING EGG.—Very fine, easy to perform and it produces a marvelous and mystifying effect. Egg is made to appear and vanish right before the eyes. Beautifully made. Price, 25c.

FRANK SMITH, 383 Lenox Ave., N. Y.

INDIAN FINGER TRAP.

A couple can be joined together and their struggle to be released only makes matters worse. It will hold them as tight as a rat-trap, and the more they try to pull away, the tighter it grips. Our traps are extra long. Price, 10c. each; 3 for 25c. by mail, postpaid.

C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

GIANT SAW PUZZLE.

This puzzle contains twenty-one pieces of wood nicely finished; take them apart and put them together same as illustrated. Everybody would like to try it, as it is very fascinating. Price, by mail, postpaid, 25c. each.

C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

NEW TEN-CENT FOUNTAIN PEN.

One of the most peculiar and mystifying pens on the market. It requires no ink. All you have to do is to dip it in water, and it will write for an indefinite period. The secret can only be learned by procuring one, and you can make it a source of both pleasure and amusement by claiming to your friends what it can do and then demonstrating the fact. Moreover, it is a good pen, fit for practical use, and will never leak ink into your pocket, as a defective fountain pen might do. Price, 10c. each by mail.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

X-RAY WONDER

This is a wonderful little optical illusion. In use, you apparently see the bones in your hand, the hole in a pipe-stem, the lead in a pencil, etc. The principle on which it is operated cannot be disclosed here, but it will afford no end of fun for any person who has one. Price, 15 cents each, by mail, postpaid.

FRANK SMITH, 383 Lenox Ave., N. Y.

THE IRON CROSS

There are lots of people who want to bring the European war into this country. But we don't want it. When you find a foreign patriot shooting off his mouth, just pin one of these iron crosses on his lapel. Guaranteed to cork up the most blatant troublemaker on earth. Price, 10c. each, by mail, postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

COIN PURSE

You cannot lose your change by carrying one of these handy purses. They are made of the finest Morocco, with a clasp that simply will not unfasten itself. Within are heavy rubber receptacles for holding nickels, dimes, and quarters. Each compartment holds a number of coins. They cannot be abstracted unless you take them out yourself. Pickpockets hate these purses.

Price 25c. each, by mail, postpaid. H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

TRICK PURSE

One of the most innocent-looking little pocketbooks you ever saw. Hand it to your friend, and tell him to help himself. As he unfastens the button a spring inside causes the purse to fly open, sending several coins up in the air before his astonished gaze. This is a real fun maker. You cannot afford to be without one.

Price, 25c. each, by mail, postpaid. C. BEHR, 150 W. 62d St., New York City.

MAGIC COINER.

A mystifying and amusing trick. Tin blanks are placed under the little tin cup and apparently coined into dimes. A real money-maker. Price, 20c.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

THE MAGNETIC TOP.

A handsome metal, highly magnetized toy. A horseshoe and a spiral wire furnished with each top. When spun next to the wires, they make the most surprising movements. You can make wires of different shapes and get the most peculiar effects. Price, 5c., postpaid.

WOLFF NOVELTY CO., 29 W. 26th St., N. Y.

WE WANT YOU

TO READ

"Moving Picture Stories"

A Weekly Magazine devoted to Photoplays and Players

::

Absolutely the finest little publication on the news-stands

PRICE 5 CENTS A COPY

ISSUED EVERY FRIDAY

BEAUTIFUL COLORED COVER DESIGNS

THIRTY-TWO PAGES

FINE HALF-TONE FRONTISPICES

New portraits of actors and actresses every week

-

Get a copy of this weekly magazine and see what it is

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS

Six Gripping Stories, based on the latest and best films, each profusely illustrated with fine half-tones of scenes in the plays.

Photographs and Biographies of the most celebrated Photoplay actors and actresses.

Special Articles relating to Moving Pictures, written by the greatest authorities in the film business.

News Notes from the studios about the doings of everybody of prominence connected with the Photoplays.

Scenario Hints and the names of all the companies who may buy the plays you write.

Poems, Jingles, Jests and every bright feature calculated to interest both young and old.

GET A COPY NOW from your newsdealer, or send us 5 cents in money or postage stamps, and we will mail you the latest number issued.

FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher

168 West 23d Street

New York

FA ME AND FORTUNE WEEKLY

—LATEST ISSUES—

- 446 The Boy Behind the Deals; or, The Luck of a Wall Street Broker.
- 447 Thrown on the World; or, Starting Business on a Dollar.
- 448 A Speculator at 16; or, The Lad Who Worked His Brains.
- 449 Tom, the Steeple Jack; or, Winning a Living by Nerve.
- 450 Saving a Million; or, Ben and the Wall Street Brokers.
- 451 Down and Out; or, A Hard Boy to Beat.
- 452 The Boy Banker's Double; or, A Strange Wall Street Mystery.
- 453 The Young Beach Comber; or, A Fortune From the Sand.
- 454 The Little Boss; or, After the Wall Street Money Kings.
- 455 $250,000 in Gold; or, Hunting a Hindoo Treasure.
- 456 A Corner in Money; or, Beating the Wall Street Money Sharks.
- 457 Going it Alone; or, The Boy Who Made His Own Luck.
- 458 Little Dan Tucker; or, Making Big Money in Wall St.
- 459 Fighting for Business; or, Beating a Bad Start.
- 460 A Boy Money Maker; or, In Wall Street on His Nerve.
- 461 Buried Gold; or, The Treasure of the Old Buccaneers.
- 462 Hitting it Rich; or, The Luckiest Firm in Wall St.
- 463 Sam, the Salesman; or, The Boy With the Silver Tongue.
- 464 Playing in Luck; or, A Plotter's Dangerous Deal.
- 465 After a Big Stake; or, Brains Against Brawn.
- 466 Facing the Mexicans; or, The Secret Of the Aztec's Gold.
- 467 Fighting For Fame; or, The Luck Of a Young Contractor.
- 468 Seeking a Lost Treasure; or, The Nerve Of a Young Explorer.
- 469 Matt, the Mechanic; or, The Boy Who Made His Pile.
- 470 Among the Ice Peaks; or, The Voyage That Made the Money.
- 471 The Little Castaways; or, The Fortune That a Wreck Brought.
- 472 Taking Big Chances; or, The Boy Who Saved a Town.
- 473 Always Lucky; or, Winning on His Merits.
- 474 Out for a Corner; or, A Smart Chicago Boy.
- 475 The Winning Trick; or, How a Boy Made His Mark.
- 476 The Young Editor; or, Running a Country Newspaper.
- 477 A Big Stroke; or, The Lad Who Made a Record.
- 478 In the Copper Field; or, The Mine That Made the Money.

- 479 From a Cent to a Fortune; or, A Chicago Boy's Great Scoop.
- 480 A Start in Life; or, A Poor Boy's Rise to Fame.
- 481 A Wide Awake Boy; or, Born With a Winning Streak.
- 482 Capturing the Money; or, How Ben Bailey Made His Mark.
- 483 Digging for Gold; or, The Luck of a Boy Miner.
- 484 A Boy With Grit; or, Earning An Honest Living.
- 485 Andy, the Mill Boy; or, Rising to the Top.
- 486 Fame Before the Footlights; or, The Boy Who Bossed the Theater.
- 487 Lucky Lee, the Office Boy; or, The Nerviest Lad in New York.
- 488 Sure to Get Rich; or, A Smart Young Messenger.
- 489 Pushing it Through; or, The Fate of a Lucky Boy.
- 490 A Born Speculator; or, The Young Sphinx of Wall Street.
- 491 The Way to Success; or, The Boy Who Got There.
- 492 Struck Oil; or, The Boy Who Made a Million.
- 493 A Golden Risk; or, The Young Miners of Della Cruz.
- 494 A Sure Winner; or, The Boy Who Went Out With a Circus.
- 495 Golden Fleece; or, The Boy Brokers of Wall Street.
- 496 A Madcap Scheme; or, The Boy Treasure Hunters of Cocos Island.
- 497 Adrift on the World; or, Working His Way to Fortune.
- 498 Playing to Win; or, The Foxiest Boy in Wall Street.
- 499 Tatters; or, A Boy from the Slums.
- 500 A Young Monte Cristo; or, The Richest Boy in the World.
- 501 Won by Pluck; or, The Boys Who Ran a Railroad.
- 502 Beating the Brokers; or, The Boy Who "Couldn't Be Done."
- 503 A Rolling Stone; or, The Brightest Boy on Record.
- 504 Never Say Die; or, The Young Surveyor of Happy Valley.
- 505 Boss of the Market; or, The Greatest Boy in Wall Street.
- 506 The Chance of His Life; or, The Young Pilot of Crystal Lake.
- 507 Striving for Fortune; or, From Bell-Boy to Millionaire.
- 508 Out for Business; or, The Smartest Boy in Town.

For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 5 cents per copy, in money or postage stamps, by
FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher, 168 West 23d St., New York.

IF YOU WANT ANY BACK NUMBERS

of our weeklies and cannot procure them from newsdealers, they can be obtained from this office direct. Write out and fill in your Order and send it to us with the price of the weeklies you want and we will send them to you by return mail POSTAGE STAMPS TAKEN THE SAME AS MONEY.
FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher, 168 West 23d St., New York.

OUR TEN-CENT HAND BOOKS

No. 1. NAPOLEON'S ORACULUM AND DREAM BOOK.—Containing the great oracle of human destiny; also the true meaning of almost any kind of dreams, together with charms, ceremonies, and curious games of cards.

No. 2. HOW TO DO TRICKS.—The great book of magic and card tricks, containing full instruction on all the leading card tricks of the day, also the most popular magical illusions as performed by our leading magicians; every boy should obtain a copy of this book.

No. 3. HOW TO FLIRT.—The arts and wiles of flirtation are fully explained by this little book. Besides the various methods of handkerchief, fan, glove, parasol, window and hat flirtation, it contains a full list of the language and sentiment of flowers.

No. 4. HOW TO DANCE is the title of this little book. It contains full instructions in the art of dancing, etiquette in the ball-room and at parties, how to dress, and full directions for calling off in all popular square dances.

No. 5. HOW TO MAKE LOVE.—A complete guide to love, courtship and marriage, giving sensible advice, rules and etiquette to be observed, with many curious and interesting things not generally known.

No. 6. HOW TO BECOME AN ATHLETE.—Giving full instruction for the use of dumbbells, Indian clubs, parallel bars, horizontal bars and various other methods of developing a good, healthy muscle; containing over sixty illustrations.

No. 7. HOW TO KEEP BIRDS.—Handsomely illustrated and containing full instructions for the management and training of the canary, mockingbird, bobolink, blackbird, parakeet, parrot, etc.

No. 9. HOW TO BECOME A VENTRILOQUIST.—By Harry Kennedy. Every intelligent boy reading this book of instructions can master the art, and create any amount of fun for himself and friends. It is the greatest book ever published.

No. 10. HOW TO BOX.—The art of self-defense made easy. Containing over thirty illustrations of guards, blows, and the different positions of a good boxer. Every boy should obtain one of these useful and instructive books, as it will teach you how to box without an instructor.

No. 11. HOW TO WRITE LOVE-LETTERS.—A most complete little book, containing full directions for writing love-letters, and when to use them, giving specimen letters for young and old.

No. 12. HOW TO WRITE LETTERS TO LADIES.—Giving complete instructions for writing letters to ladies on all subjects; also letters of introduction, notes and requests.

No. 13. HOW TO DO IT; OR, BOOK OF
 For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 10 cts. per copy, or 3 for 25 cts., in money or postage stamps, by
FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher,

ETIQUETTE.—It is a great life secret, and one that every young man desires to know all about. There's happiness in it.

No. 14. HOW TO MAKE CANDY.—A complete hand-book for making all kinds of candy, ice-cream, syrups, essences, etc., etc.

No. 18. HOW TO BECOME BEAUTIFUL.—One of the brightest and most valuable little books ever given to the world. Everybody wishes to know how to become beautiful, both male and female. The secret is simple, and almost costless.

No. 20. HOW TO ENTERTAIN AN EVENING PARTY.—A complete compendium of games, sports, card diversions, comic recitations, etc., suitable for parlor or drawing-room entertainment. It contains more for the money than any book published.

No. 21. HOW TO HUNT AND FISH.—The most complete hunting and fishing guide ever published. It contains full instructions about guns, hunting dogs, traps, trapping and fishing, together with description of game and fish.

No. 22. HOW TO DO SECOND SIGHT.—Heller's second sight explained by his former assistant, Fred Hunt, Jr. Explaining how the secret dialogues were carried on between the magician and the boy on the stage; also giving all the codes and signals.

No. 23. HOW TO EXPLAIN DREAMS.—This little book gives the explanation to all kinds of dreams, together with lucky and unlucky days.

No. 24. HOW TO WRITE LETTERS TO GENTLEMEN.—Containing full directions for writing to gentlemen on all subjects.

No. 25. HOW TO BECOME A GYMNAST.—Containing full instructions for all kinds of gymnastic sports and athletic exercises. Embracing thirty-five illustrations. By Professor W. Macdonald.

No. 26. HOW TO ROW, SAIL AND BUILD A BOAT.—Fully illustrated. Full instructions are given in this little book, together with instructions on swimming and riding, companion sports to boating.

No. 27. HOW TO RECITE AND BOOK OF RECITATIONS.—Containing the most popular selections in use, comprising Dutch dialect, French dialect, Yankee and Irish dialect pieces, together with many standard readings.

No. 28. HOW TO TELL FORTUNES.—Everyone is desirous of knowing what his future life will bring forth, whether happiness or misery, wealth or poverty. You can tell by a glance at this little book. Buy one and be convinced.

No. 29. HOW TO BECOME AN INVENTOR.—Every boy should know how inventions originated. This book explains them all, giving examples in electricity, hydraulics, magnetism, optics, pneumatics, mechanics, etc.

No. 30. HOW TO COOK.—One of the most instructive books on cooking ever published. It contains recipes for cooking meats, fish, game, and oysters; also pies, puddings, cakes and all kinds of pastry, and a grand collection of recipes.

No. 31. HOW TO BECOME A SPEAKER.—Containing fourteen illustrations, giving the different positions requisite to become a good speaker, reader and elocutionist. Also containing gems from all the popular authors of prose and poetry.

No. 32. HOW TO RIDE A BICYCLE.—Containing instructions for beginners, choice of a machine, hints on training, etc. A complete book. Full of practical illustrations.

No. 35. HOW TO PLAY GAMES.—A complete and useful little book, containing the rules and regulations of billiards, bagatelle, backgammon, croquet, dominoes, etc.

No. 36. HOW TO SOLVE CONUNDRUMS.—Containing all the leading conundrums of the day, amusing riddles, curious catches and witty sayings.

No. 38. HOW TO BECOME YOUR OWN DOCTOR.—A wonderful book, containing useful and practical information in the treatment of ordinary diseases and ailments common to every family. Abounding in useful and effective recipes for general complaints.

No. 39. HOW TO RAISE DOGS, POULTRY, PIGEONS AND RABBITS.—A useful and instructive book. Handsomely illustrated.

No. 40. HOW TO MAKE AND SET TRAPS.—Including hints on how to catch moles, weasels, otter, rats, squirrels and birds. Also how to cure skins. Copiously illustrated.

No. 41. THE BOYS OF NEW YORK END MEN'S JOKE BOOK.—Containing a great variety of the latest jokes used by the most famous end men. No amateur minstrel is complete without this wonderful little book.

No. 42. THE BOYS OF NEW YORK STUMP SPEAKER.—Containing a varied assortment of stump speeches, Negro, Dutch and Irish. Also end men's jokes. Just the thing for home amusement and amateur shows.

No. 43. HOW TO BECOME A MAGICIAN.—Containing the grandest assortment of magical illusions ever placed before the public. Also tricks with cards, incantations, etc.

No. 44. HOW TO WRITE IN AN ALBUM.—A grand collection of Album Verses suitable for any time and occasion; embracing Lines of Love, Affection, Sentiment, Humor, Respect, and Condolence; also Verses Suitable for Valentines and Weddings.

No. 45. THE BOYS OF NEW YORK MINSTREL GUIDE AND JOKE BOOK.—Something new and very instructive. Every boy should obtain this book, as it contains full instructions for organizing an amateur minstrel troupe.

For sale by all newsdealers, or will be sent to any address on receipt of price, 10 cts. per copy, or 3 for 25 cts., in money or postage stamps, by FRANK TOUSEY, Publisher, 168 West 23d St., New York.